That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For the preparation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, of preliminary plans for an additional fireproof, steel-frame, brick and terra-cotta building, to cost not exceeding $1,500,000, for the United States National Museum, to be erected, when appropriated for, on the Mall between Ninth and Twelfth streets west, said plans when completed to be transmitted by the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution to Congress, $5,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$90,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the line next to the last line of said amendment strike out the word "Company" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 82, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment strike out the words "proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Secretary of the Treasury; ' and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 107, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,066,570;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 126, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendment and restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, in accordance with existing plans made by him;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 127, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount named in said amendment insert "$2,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "contract," in line — of said amendment, insert the words "or contracts;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 133, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For a building to accommodate the offices of the President, to be located in the grounds of the Executive Mansion, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, including heating apparatus and light fixtures, furniture, and removal of greenhouses, all to be done according to plans, the details of which shall be approved by the President, and completed in every respect within the sum hereby appropriated, $65,196, to be expended by contract or otherwise in the discretion of, and under the direction of, the President, and to be immediately available; and said building shall be constructed with sufficient foundation and walls suitable for a durable, permanent building, and of sufficient strength for an additional story when needed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 134, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows; Strike out the amended paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For extraordinary repairs and refurnishing of the Executive Mansion and for each and every purpose connected therewith, including all necessary alterations and additions, cabinetwork, decoration of rooms, covered ways and approaches, grading, paving, porte-cochère, gates, and electric wiring and light fixtures for house and grounds, all to be done according to plans, the details of which shall be approved by the President and completed in every detail within the sum hereby appropriated, $475,445, to be immediately available, and to be expended by contract or otherwise in the discretion of, and under the direction of, the President.

"For rent of temporary offices for the President, to be immediately available, $2,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 161, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$4,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 166, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$3,723,969;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 175, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 2 and 3 of said amendment strike out the words "July 1, 1902," and insert in lieu thereof the words "June 30, 1903;" and the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
J. A. HEMENWAY,
THOS. C. McRAE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments not agreed to, mentioned in the report, and request a further conference on those amendments with the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

MONUMENT TO GEN. HUGH MERCER.

Mr. DANIEL. I renew the request I made for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10933) to provide for the erection, at Fredericksburg, Va., of the monument to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer which it was ordered by Congress, on the 8th day of April, 1777, should be erected, reported by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], from the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which was before the Senate a few moments ago. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that the erasures and the substitution, which really are intended more for the printer than anything else, it will be necessary to treat as an amendment.

Mr. WETMORE. It is considered as an amendment. I reported the bill with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on the Library report an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "words," to strike out:

Sacred to the memory of Hugh Mercer, brigadier-general in the Army of the United States. He died on the 12th of January, 1777, of the wounds he received on the 3d of the same month, near Princeton, in New Jersey, bravely defending the liberties of America. The Congress of the United States, in testimony of his virtue and their gratitude, have caused this monument to be erected.

And to insert:

Sacred to the memory of
HUGH MERCER,
Brigadier-general in the army of
The United States;
He died on the 12th of January, 1777, of the Wounds he received on the 3rd of the same month,
Near Princeton, in New Jersey,
Bravely defending the Liberties of America.
The Congress of the United States,
In testimony of his virtues, and their gratitude,
Have caused this monument to be erected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, when this bill was up a few minutes ago I said that I desired an opportunity, if it was to be considered, to propose an amendment to it; but, of course, the bill being taken up now, I have no opportunity to prepare the amendment. I simply wish to repeat what I said then, that if these monuments are to be erected because the Continental Congress appropriated $500 each for the erection of monuments to ten generals, and as nothing has been done about it, I do not propose that the memory of Gen. David Worcester shall be discriminated against; and as these monuments have increased in amount from $5,000 to $25,000——

Mr. COCKRELL. From $500.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Five thousand dollars has been appropriated heretofore by Congress. I will take occasion at the next session to introduce a bill for the erection of a monument to Gen. David Worcester, and appropriating $50,000 for that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I want to record my objection to the proposition of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut and my vote against this bill. I do not think it is right or proper or just that the measure should be passed by this Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is out of order. As the bill is leading to discussion, I feel it incumbent upon me to object to its consideration. Morning business is waiting, conference reports, and special orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming object?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes to the Calendar.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment after the word "large," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall not at any one time exceed forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That no money shall be expended or obligation incurred for architects after the plans for improvements above provided for have been approved by the Secretary of War, except that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to employ, in his discretion, a consulting architect at a compensation not exceeding $5,000 per annum."

And the Senate agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
J. C. BURROWS,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. A. T. HULL,
RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 6219) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Charles H. Cushman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MASON introduced a (S. 6220) granting an increase of pension to Walter G. Tebbetts; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 6221) granting an increase of pension to Harriet L. Ford; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompany paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 6222) granting a pension to Eliza Farrar; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 6223) granting a pension to Maria Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6224) for the relief of Peter Valentine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi introduced a bill (S. 6225) in aid of the common schools in Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLARK of Montana introduced a bill (S. 6226) granting a pension to Mary L. Butland; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 6227) for the relief of Alexander Billings; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,929.45 to pay the Propeller Towboat Company, of Savannah, Ga., for damages done the steam tugboat Cynthia, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for completing the improvements of the public building, its approaches and surroundings, at Annapolis, Md., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 to purchase or have constructed for the customs service a suitable launch for use at and in the vicinity of Astoria, Oreg., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 to enable the Committee on Claims of the Senate to prepare a record and index of private claims introduced in the Senate during the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $421.25 to pay certain persons for reporting stenographically the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CLARK of Montana submitted an amendment relative to patented lands and authorizing the reconveyance to such persons relinquishing such land by a patent, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. STEWART. By unanimous consent the motion heretofore made to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 4848 was passed was to be considered at this time. Since that unanimous consent was given the House of Representatives has passed a bill providing for substantially the same agreement as is provided for in the Senate bill. The Committee on Indian Affairs has reported it, and the bill is on the Calendar.

It is evident that there will not be time to dispose of the matter this morning, and I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which Senate bill 4848 was passed be reconsidered, that the bill be indefinitely postponed, and that House bill 13172, on the same subject, take the place of the Senate bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that House bill 13172, on the Calendar, take the place of Senate bill 4848, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the Senator further asks that the House bill be considered on Monday in the morning hour.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that by unanimous consent the House bill be made the unfinished business for Monday. It will take but little time, and there is no unfinished business on that occasion. I think we can then dispose of it. It is a very important matter. The Department say they are unable to close up affairs in the Indian Territory, to get the allotments made by the Dawes Commission arranged, etc., without passing the bill making the agreement with the Indians, and the Department regard it as very urgent.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 4848) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes, which, by unanimous consent, heretofore was given certain rights, be indefinitely postponed, and that on Monday next at 2 o'clock House bill 13172, relating to the same subject, may receive the rights and privileges previously granted to the Senate bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I simply addressed the Chair for the purpose of making a statement. I will only occupy a moment. I thought the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] was going on, and that after he concluded I could make my statement to the Senate.

I consent to this unanimous-consent arrangement, because while the House bill is almost as objectionable as the Senate bill as to the judgments involved still the House bill does fairly and properly adjust the matter of town sites. I might delay it by objecting to the proposition to substitute the House bill, but I have no desire to do that and have no desire to defeat it if we can reach an agreement that is fair as to those judgments, because the House bill is fair and reasonable in respect to the town sites. So I agree to the substitution.

FOOD ADULTERATION, ETC.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that bill (S. 3342) for preventing the adulteration, misbranding, and imitations of foods, beverages, candies, drugs, and condiments in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and for regulating interstate traffic therein, and for other purposes, which is the second bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII, be considered next Wednesday after the routine morning business, without limitation of debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, after the routine morning business, the Senate will consider the bill named by him.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall not object to that if the usual exemptions as to appropriation bills and conference reports are made, and if it is understood that the bill shall have the right of way for that day only.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And to be considered only during the morning hour?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is entirely satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the bill may receive the consideration of the Senate on Wednesday next after the completion of the routine morning business, subject, however, to appropriation bills and conference reports, and to be considered only in the morning hour of that day.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It will be time enough to consider that question when a motion is made to take up the bill. I am unwilling now for a unanimous-consent agreement to have the bill considered on Wednesday of next week. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas subsequently said: I objected a moment ago to the unanimous-consent agreement asked for by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to fix a time for the consideration of the bill named by him, but as I now understand the Senator merely wishes to have the bill taken up for the purpose of making some remarks upon it and without any idea of securing action. With that understanding I will withdraw my objection to the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that the bill referred to by him may receive consideration in the morning hour only, subject to appropriation bills and conference reports, on Wednesday next after the completion of the routine morning business?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It being understood that the bill is to be taken up for the purpose of enabling the Senator to make some remarks upon it, and that no action is to be taken.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It being understood that no action is to be taken upon the bill other than that indicated by the Senator from North Dakota. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a few minutes to enable me to have a bridge bill considered? There is not the slightest objection to it.

Mr. WARREN. I should be very glad to accommodate my friend from Tennessee, but I have already refused a half dozen such requests from other Senators, and, under the circumstances, I can not properly yield to the Senator.

Mr. BATE. Very well; I will not press the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 23, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 20, 1902.

Blanchard B. Weber, of Salamanca, N. Y., to be agent for the Indians of the New York Agency, in New York.

William R. Logan, of Helena, Mont., to be agent for the Indians at the Fort Belknap Agency, in Montana.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 20, 1902.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FIRST REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER LIGHT ARTILLERY.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 619) providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery (three months' service), furnished by the State of Ohio under the call of the President of the United States issued on the 15th day of April, 1861, and which rendered actual military service under the command of officers of the United States and in cooperation with the regularly organized military forces of the United States, shall be held and considered to have been in the military service of and to have formed a part of the military establishment of the United States during the period for which said organization was enlisted and was in active service, and that the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to issue certificates of discharge, upon due application and satisfactory proof of identity, for all honorably discharged members of the said organization.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like the gentleman from Ohio to give us a full explanation of this measure. I should like to know why these men can not obtain the relief they seek through the ordinary channels and under the existing law. This bill seems to me to be pretty far reaching.

Mr. BURTON. This company of 131 men went into the military service on the 20th of April, 1861. They immediately went into the field.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman will pardon me a moment. Did I understand him to say that there are only 131 men interested in this bill?

Mr. BURTON. That is the exact number.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is spoken of as a "regiment,"

Mr. BURTON. It is called a regiment, because it was made up of separate companies manning six guns.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I was misled by the name.

Mr. HULL. It was in fact a battery under the title of a regiment.

Mr. BURTON. It was a battery. It was the first military organization using artillery in the civil war. In the haste with which these men were called into the field there was no formal muster. On the 30th of May, while proceeding into West Virginia, the mustering officer of the United States came along for the purpose of making the formal muster. The commander of the regiment, as it was called, Colonel Barnett, stated to the mustering officer that the circumstances were so urgent that they could not wait for the muster. They went immediately into the field. They were mustered out at the close of the three months, and the very large majority of them reenlisted for three years. The statement has been made to me that by this bill only two of the regiment will be made eligible to receive pensions who are not eligible already. The service of the company was recognized as a regular service of the United States until 1896, and one of these two drew his pension until that year, when it was cut off.

This bill is but an act of justice. These men were in fact in the United States service, but by reason of the lack of this formal muster they did not have the legal status of soldiers of the United States.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to make a short explanation?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. HULL. The Committee on Military Affairs has unanimously reported this bill on two or three different occasions, for the reason that when these men first went into camp in Ohio the governor of Ohio received a telegram from General McClellan, commanding in West Virginia, urging him to forward men if possible at once. This battery, without waiting to be mustered into the United States service, went to West Virginia and served under McClellan during the entire three months' term. The governor sent a man to the capital of Ohio for the purpose of mustering them; and if they had been there they would have been mustered. They were recognized as in the United States service to the extent of going out of the State and serving during their entire term of three months, participating in several battles.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How long did they serve?

Mr. HULL. During the entire enlistment of three months, and they would have been mustered except for the urgent call for troops made by General McClellan, then commanding in West Virginia.

Mr. KLEBERG. While they were in service, were they under the orders of United States officers?

Mr. HULL. They were under the orders of the United States commander in West Virginia, who was at that time General McClellan.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire what sort of provision is made as to their receiving any pay.

Mr. HULL. It simply recognizes them as being in the service, without giving them any pay, bounty, or emolument.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I was going to inquire about that last provision I could not catch it as the Clerk read it. It provides that there shall be no back pay?

Mr. HULL. No pay, bounty, or emoluments.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the proviso.

The Clerk again read the proviso.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], as I understand, says that there are but two of them eligible for pensions?

Mr. BURTON. That is the statement which has been made to me, and one of those two did receive a pension on the theory that the enlistment had been regular until 1896, when the pension was cut off. He is now nearly 75 years old.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How many of these 131 soldiers are now living?

Mr. BURTON. I am not able to answer that question, but less than half, I could safely say.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if most of them are pensioned now under the second service?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; at least of those entitled to pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES MAPS.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 197, making certain appropriations of April 17, 1900, for printing United States maps, available for the fiscal year 1902, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the $14,840 appropriated by the act of Congress approved April 17, 1900, for the connected and separate United States and other maps prepared in the General Land Office of the United States, which appropriation was made available for expenditure during the fiscal year 1902 by act of Congress approved March 3, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, made available for expenditure during the fiscal year 1902: Provided, however, That the said maps shall be immediately printed, mounted, and delivered to the extent and in the numbers provided by said act of Congress approved April 17, 1900, and the same shall be so made by the Secretary of the Interior from the manuscript map prepared by the General Land Office for the year 1893, with the additions and corrections made thereto from the data furnished by the General Land Office: Provided further, That said maps shall be delivered to the Senate and House of Representatives for distribution by October 1, 1902.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, by direction of the Committee on Printing, asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the clerk has reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TATE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls for the regular order. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill just reported by its title, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2295, the Philippine government bill, with Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair.

[Mr. JONES of Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. COUSINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6070. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at a point to be selected within 5 miles north of the Kaw River, in Wyandotte County, State of Kansas, and Clay County, State of Missouri, and to make the same a post route; and

S. 6138. An act to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota as a public park, to be known as the Wind Cave National Park.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13123) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 4636. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on this disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15004. An act to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnepeg Railroad Company, of Minnesota, to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the said bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. MORGAN, Mr. HANNA, and Mr. KITTREDGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, in 1520 Magellan, a Portuguese soldier and mariner, sailing under the flag of Spain, discovered the straits which bear his name, and sailing westward, discovered the Philippine Islands, where, having taken sides in a native broil, he was killed on the island of Mactan, April 25, 1521.

Of five ships with which Magellan sailed from Spain, only one made the circuit of the globe. One was wrecked off the eastern coast of South America, another deserted there, another was destroyed by the remnant of Magellan's followers after his death because they had not men enough to man it, another sprung a leak off Borneo, and finally one ship, the Victoria, with 18 survivors, came back to the port from which she sailed.

This voyage demonstrated that the world was round, and it was then first dimly realized in Europe that a mighty ocean lay between the unknown shores of America and Asia.

Compared with the tremendous sweep of years between the Pyramids and the Eiffel Tower the time from Magellan's voyage to now seems short, and yet it marks the world's transition from medievalism to modern rationalism, and holds within its scope the development of a new world, with new forms of government undreamed of then.

When Magellan sailed westward into the East men believed the earth to be the center of the universe; that the sun, moon, and stars were hung in the heavens to light the earth, and to teach otherwise was to disturb an elaborate system of theology and to encounter the danger of being treated as a combustible heretic.

Then men believed in witchcraft, king's evil, the divine right of kings, in black art and white art, good spirits and bad spirits; that comets were missiles hurled at a wicked world; that the lightnings were the javelins of Jehovah; that the earthquake was the literal voice of an angry God; and even as late as Newton's time his theory of gravitation was declared unscriptural, because it substituted gravitation for Providence.

Since then a tremendous change has moved by slow degrees across the face of the earth, new coasts of scientific truth have been explored, but in the Philippine Islands progress has lagged.

These islands took their name in 1544 from Philip, son of Charles I, then heir apparent to the throne of Castile, to which he came as Philip II in 1555.

Including the Sulu group, which form their southern boundary and rim the southern confines of the Sulu Sea, they number, large and small, more than 1,000 islands, contain about 119,000 square miles, and extend from 5° north latitude northward through about 16 degrees.

Their general shape upon the map is like the colossal skeleton of a man or an ape, seated bent forward, with his back toward the Pacific and his arms and legs extended toward Borneo, with Luzon forming the head and shoulders, Samar, Leyte, and Mindanao the back and hips, while Panay, Negros, Cebu, Masbate, and Bojol fill out the breast.

The southwest monsoon brings the wet season, which lasts nominally six months from about the middle of April, except in that part toward the Pacific, where the seasons are reversed.

On the margins of slowly widening circles around slowly developing centers of civilization, savagery has been slowly receding into the tropical woods and mountains where over thousands of primeval acres nature still holds sway.

The history of those parts of the islands which were brought directly under the dominion of Spain is a history of friction and intrigue, of unjust and repressive taxation, of chronic official dishonesty, of no justice except for those who could pay for it, and no return for the taxes drawn from the people.

THE PEOPLE.

An independent government is not necessarily a free government. A government may be independent and not free, or it may be free and not independent.

A free government is one wherein its people are protected in their "persons, property, reputations, family, and liberties."

In considering whether independence now would bring freedom to the people of the Philippine Islands, in considering whether independence would introduce order or disorder, we ought to consider their condition and their character.

In the first place, there is no such thing as a Filipino nation. The native population, whom, for purposes of description, Professor Worcester groups as Christian Malays, Mohammedan Malays, Pagan Malays, and Negritos, belong to three distinct races—the Malay, the Indonesian, and the Negrito.

The Malays form a majority of the population.

The Indonesians live in Mindanao, and are Malay crossed with Caucasian.

The Negritos are scattered in mountain tribes over the whole archipelago. They are of small stature, low grade of intellect, pronounced incapable of civilization, and are rapidly disappearing.

These three races are divided among about 84 tribes speaking various dialects and languages.

Of these tribes are three great civilized tribes—the Tagalogs, Visayans, and Ilocanos—although, if the word tribe be used in its ordinary sense as describing a tribal organization with a chief at its head, the civilized Filipinos are not, properly speaking, divisible into tribes. Their main difference is the difference in language.

Down to 1844 only a minority of the people had distinctive family names. It is now claimed, however, that the civilized natives are sufficiently homogeneous to be treated as a class.

Of the semicivilized or uncivilized tribes are:

The various tribes of Negritos;

The Gaddanes of northern Luzon, among whom it is the interesting custom of young men about to set up a domestic establishment to present to their prospective fathers-in-law such heads of such of their enemies as they are able to take during the season when the firé tree is in bloom as proof of their courage;

The Igorrotes, who live principally north of a line drawn east from the Gulf of Lingayen and cultivate the soil to some extent;

The half-caste Igorrotes, who are Igorrote crossed with Chinese who fled to the hills of Luzon on the expulsion of Limahong, the Chinese pirate, in 1574, and who are superior to the pure Igorrotes in intelligence;

The Tinguianes, who inhabit principally the district of El Abra and were nominally under the control of the Spanish Government, which appointed their headsman;

The Tagbanuas of Palauan, who are descended from Negritos and Malays;

The various tribes of Moros, who live in Mindanao and the Sulu Islands.

About one-tenth of the people of the so-called civilized or Christian tribes speak Spanish, and are educated in varying degrees, from a culture that would adorn any civilization downward.

The education of the other 90 per cent ranges rapidly downward, from the ability to read and speak their local dialects and write their own names to no education at all.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one question. Is it true that when the war between the United States and Spain broke out there were 800 native boys attending the university at Manila?

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not know. I say to the gentleman frankly, I have no statistics at hand that would enable me to answer his question accurately; but the gentleman on the other side, who spoke just a moment ago, said there were 9 universities scattered over the islands.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague allow me a moment? Under the Spanish dominion there were 30,000 students only in all the schools, and under the American occupation there are already 200,000 in the various schools. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN. You say you are not informed as to that?

Mr. HAMILTON. I can not state. But I will state to my friend that what I am stating is absolutely true within my investigation, and I think the gentleman from Missouri will agree with me that only 10 per cent of the whole Christian civilization are educated, as I have said, and the education of the other 90 per cent runs rapidly downward from ability to write their names and speak their local language or dialect to no education at all.

There is no general language. For illustration, in the province of Bulacan the people speak Tagalog; 20 miles from there they speak Pampangan; and neither can understand the other.

The south half of Tarlac speaks Pampangan, and the north half speaks Pangasinan, and neither understands the other; and so on through the islands.

Since there is no general language there can be no general literature. The Tagalog is the only language which has any literature.

TEMPERAMENT.

In an endeavor to analyze the Malay temperament, Foreman, the historian, says:

> The native is an incomprehensible phenomenon, the mainspring of whose line of thought and the guiding motive of whose action has never yet been discovered.

The Taft Commission, however, seems to be solving this problem by a course of candor and fair dealing which is winning the confidence and affection of the people.

Therefore any action here or there which would uncoil suspicion would not only undo the splendid work which has been done, but would retard future development.

Let us examine this alleged "incomprehensible phenomenon."

When you come to analyze them after all, human motives, veneered or otherwise, in camp or capital, clad in a blanket or a dress suit, run easily back to the elemental passions of love, hate, anger, pride, jealousy, envy, and covetousness. They grade into each other and take unto themselves other names; but they lurk behind human actions, civilized and uncivilized.

The native is treacherous and cruel in war, and it is said their traits do not desert him in time of peace; but he has been bred to the ambuscade, to the stab in the back of a stronger foe, and if he has learned to withhold his confidence has he not been justified by years of treachery toward himself?

He is said to be fond of gambling, but he is not peculiar in this respect. We have eminent financiers in this country intrusted with other people's money who also gamble.

He is accused of being long on promises and short on fulfillment. This unfortunately is not peculiar to any race.

It is said that his bump of mendacity is unduly developed; that he does not appear to hold lying wrong even in the confessional, and that he frequently lies without any apparent excuse "unless it be the aesthetic satisfaction derived from the exercise of a remarkable talent in this direction."

Detection does not confuse him, it is said, but he is chagrined that his art was not more successful.

The Malay ought to make an excellent diplomat of the kind mistakenly supposed to exist before Mr. John Hay entered his recent disclaimer.

He illustrates the saying that language is given to conceal thought, and finds his likeness in the ancient Greek, to whom "a pungent untruth made true or a luminous and startling lie was a joy forever," who "entered the treaty room with a dilemma, arranged the terms with a subterfuge, and went out with a mental reservation."

Besides, what would you have? Here are a people with a natural talent for subtle modes of expression fostered by three hundred years of contact with Spanish indirection.

Let us not, however, throw too many stones at the Malay.

Touch our own civilization closely on taxes and many other things and it begins to exhibit certain alleged Malay propensities.

Officers who administer oaths in our courts frequently feel that the oath is not taking effect, and our preachers do not yet feel at liberty to neglect references to the undiminished beauty of truth even to their most advanced congregations.

It is said the native finds exaggerated enjoyment in litigation. They have cases of Jarndyce and Jarndyce over there as well as in English-speaking countries.

Litigation is a distinctly civilized science, and the native propensity for games of chance would naturally find gratification in lawsuits, especially with the kind of courts and the kind of justice heretofore opened to them by their instructors in civilization.

The natives are charged with being averse to social order, but it would not be surprising if they did not appreciate the advantages of the "social compact," especially as it has been exhibited to them. They have been governed on the theory that governments exist for the benefit of the governors and have been on the wrong side of the governmental theory to obtain the most agreeable view.

The doctrine that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" is comparatively new in the world and has only recently been heard of in the Philippine Islands.

It is said that they are not energetic. If they were they would be an exception among tropical peoples.

There is no special reason for energy in the Tropics.

There are no winters to prepare for, no coal bills to pay. The fruit and the blossoms grow together on the same tree. Seed time and harvest are the whole year round. Nature sows the seed and hastens the product to maturity.

It is a land of exuberant life and quick decay. Why hurry?

As an old Spaniard said to Professor Worcester:

"In your country time is gold; here in the Philippines it is boiled rice."

They are said also to be hospitable but insincere; apparently imperturbable but excitable; credulous but suspicious; sober but fatalistic; plodding but improvident; religious but unscrupulous; unambitious but acquisitive; skillful but unsystematic, clean, artistic, musical, quick to learn, endowed with remarkable memories, faithful to the marriage relation or to irregular connections, and affectionate to their children.

And yet, complex as these characteristics may seem, "the mass of the people," are said to be "simple, and to have that kind of honesty which comes with simplicity."

Perhaps there are many more cultivated communities who could not file a better inventory without the aid of a biased historian.

THE FRIARS.

The government of the Philippine Islands has been a government by church and state, and religious orders have been the stronger element.

The Spanish friar combined within himself both church and state. He was spiritual guide, municipal ruler, and government agent all combined.

He was paramount in his parish, and his words had greater weight than the commands of a civil officer.

He could mix with a temporal order the hope of eternal reward or the fear of eternal punishment.

He held the conscience of the natives by the invisible power of religious influence and was powerful in all temporal matters.

The friar was there for life; the civil and military officers were there for four years, or less, if their methods did not suit the friars.

As relates to the Philippine Islands the term friars includes the members of four orders, viz, the Augustinians, the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the Recolletos, the Recolletos being the unshod branch of the order of St. Augustine, who are known as the shod.

The church was financially supported by the State to the extent of about $750,000 a year, and religious corporations possessed large private revenues.

Of the four great orders, one, the Franciscan, was by its own rules not permitted to own property except conventos and schools, but the other three orders were lords of immense manors in the midst of a tax-ridden population. They owned and still own 403,000 acres of the richest lands in the islands. They own valuable business property in Manila, have large investments in Hongkong, and have money to lend.

Outside these four orders are the Jesuits, Benedictines, Capuchins, and Paulists, who have a few teachers engaged in teaching and mission work and who have not aroused the antagonism of the people.

The monks, as originally organized in the Middle Ages by such holy men as Benedict, Bernard, and Francis, were laymen. They settled upon some of the waste places of Europe, and transformed them into fields of fertile beauty. Gradually they became clerical and were finally merged into the Roman See.

The Jesuits, it appears, are on the whole the most learned ecclesiastics in the islands, and have done good work in so far as they have been permitted. They were banished from France, Spain, Portugal, and the Philippine Islands about 1768 by an order of Pope Clement XIV, but were permitted to return to the islands in 1852 on condition that they confine themselves to teaching and missionary work.

Into the web of European history Macaulay and other historians charge that Jesuit intrigues have woven both good and evil. Be this as it may, no order of men has ever shown more fearless and unselfish consecration to noble purposes, whether in crowded cities or trackless forests, than the men who compose this order.

Their sacrifices and their sufferings, as well as the sacrifices and sufferings of friars who have lived true to the tenets of their faith, go far to atone for the failure of their weaker brethren who have fallen before temptation, and such failure is cause not for denunciation of the orders themselves or of the church to which they belong, but for regret that a great cause should be so marred.

Discussion of the friars in the Philippine Islands does not in any way involve reflection upon the church.

It is not to be inferred that the church has connived at or in any way upheld abuses in the Philippine Islands. There is no reason to suppose that it would not have controlled the friars long ago if it could have done so.

It is cause for regret that in any correct analysis of Philippine conditions the relation of the friars to the people must be taken into consideration as one of the governing elements, and that all the history and all the testimony bearing upon this subject compels us to know whether there is cause for it or not:

That the friars are intensely hated there both as landlords and as the political agents of Spain.

That they would be killed if they attempted to return to their lands.

That to attempt to uphold them against the people would precipitate another revolution; and that the feeling against them is political, not religious.

The Christian Filipino is a good Catholic, devoted to his church, and nothing could so demonstrate the depth of his hostility to the friars as the fact that notwithstanding his love for his church he hates the Spanish friar, whom he regards as the agent and policeman of Spain.

One source of Aguinaldo's power was that he preached the confiscation of the friars' lands and their division among the people. The place where these lands are was the hotbed of revolution and the place where insurrection continued longest.

To the end, then, that the friar lands question may be taken out of the Philippine problem it is proposed by this bill to authorize the Philippine government to issue bonds to raise money to buy these lands at fair prices, hold them as public property of the Philippine government, sell them at reasonable prices on easy terms to actual settlers, and to use the money so received as a sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds so issued.

THE CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

The Spanish government of the Philippine Islands was a government of tyranny. After the Spanish conquest the islands were gradually divided into provinces and military districts as they yielded to Spanish dominion.

These provinces were called encomiendas and were originally governed by encomiendaros, who held their positions sometimes as rewards for services, sometimes by purchase, and made what they could unincumbered by conscientious scruples. They were finally superseded by judicial governors called alcaldes, who received small salaries and were allowed to trade. They therefore monopolized trade, tolerated no competition, fixed the purchase price of commodities to suit themselves, and sold at a liberal profit.

Unfit men without training or character frequently held these places, who ruled "without any counselor but their rude understanding or any guide but their passions." Finally, in 1844, by royal decree, government officials were prohibited from trading.

The judicial function was also lodged in them, so that the judge cooperated with himself as executive and as executive cooperated with himself as judge.

This went on till 1886, when the office of civil governor was created in lieu of that of the alcalde mayor, with the same powers, except that the judicial power was taken from him and vested independently.

Of late the custom has been to appoint a lieutenant-general as governor, with the local rank as captain-general, to hold for a term of three years.

Mindanao and the Sulu Islands were divided into military districts.

Luzon and the Visayan Islands were divided into:

1. Provinces and districts, presided over by a governor, assisted by a provincial council.
2. Each province or district was divided into pueblos (towns), governed by a municipal tribunal.
3. Each pueblo was divided into distritos (divisions).
4. Each distrito was divided into barrios (wards).
5. Each barrio was divided into barangayes (groups of 50 to 100 families), presided over by a cabeza de barangay (head of a hundred).

Over all was the governor-general, assisted by a council of administration composed of three delegates from Luzon and three from the Visayan Islands, selected by provincial councils.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

Few improvements were made by provincial governors. There was no advantage in deserving well. Merit could not insure continuance in office beyond a ministerial change.

Those exceptional governors who studied the needs of their provinces did so to no purpose. Their estimates for roads, bridges, and public works were seldom considered, and provincial funds which ought to have been expended locally were diverted to other purposes.

For illustration, Foreman cites the province of Albay, from which, according to the annual statement of 1882, there was drawn nearly $350,000, none of which was in any way returned to the province.

In Batangas $300,000 was collected in 1882, and yet financial aid was refused the province during an epidemic of cholera that year.

There was a chief inspector of public works with an annual salary of $6,500, aided theoretically by a staff of 130 subordinates, who permitted public buildings to lapse into ruin.

If sums were appropriated for highway improvement, improvements were seldom made. The roads were always dusty or muddy, and most of them were never better than bridle paths. A broken bridge remained broken, and travelers forded the stream. There was no provision for the purchase of tools, cartage, or materials.

To cut a log for public use required a permit from the inspector of woods and forests, and it took a long time to communicate with him.

Official hours of work were only from 10 o'clock till noon. Besides, public officers were not there for public improvement.

TAXES.

Under the law every male inhabitant of prescribed age was obliged to render to the Government labor or its equivalent in money. So far as possible, money was collected, and the tax collectors reported the natives as having worked out their taxes and then put the money in their own pockets. The system was very simple. Government officials generally went home rich.

The native was taxed sitting, standing, sleeping, and waking; at the church and at the grave.

In all the islands there were 725 towns and 23 missions. Each town was governed by a capitan. Each barrio was divided into barangayes, which paid taxes to their respective heads, who were responsible to the capitan. Each capitan made return to the provincial governor and council, who, in turn, remitted to the treasury at Manila, less what officials stole en route. The barangay chief was held responsible for what his 50 families ought to pay, whether they paid or not, and was frequently imprisoned, made bankrupt, and sold out to make good what he could not collect.

Official swindling was common. The Spanish system was to set one official to watch another, presuming no man honest, and Spanish officials generally justified the presumption of their Government in this behalf. Such a government produced its logical result—rebellion.

THE REBELLION OF 1896.

The rebellion of 1872, known as the Cavite insurrection, graded into the rebellion of 1896. It grew out of native hostility to Spanish friars, as other uprisings had done. It was put down with a strong arm, and those who escaped death were banished, or imprisoned; but the fires of rebellion smoldered on beneath the surface.

A native oath-bound secret society, known as the Katipunan, was formed, whose members signed their names on the roll of the order with blood drawn from incisions in their arms or legs, the scars of which remained as marks for mutual recognition.

The rebellion of 1896 was to have commenced with a general slaughter of Spaniards, but the plot was revealed by a woman through the confessional, and again the tragedy of death, banishment, and imprisonment was enacted.

At that time on the other side of the world a rebellion in Cuba was taxing the resources of Spain. Her force in the Philippine Islands was down to 1,500 Spanish troops and 6,000 native troops, more or less disaffected, but reenforcements were sent out from Spain until near the end of 1896 General Blanco had 10,000 men.

Meanwhile the rebellion had spread northward and southward of Manila. Thirty-five thousand insurgents occupied the province of Cavite with headquarters near Silan, where Emilio Aguinaldo first became prominent. Priests on the one side and peaceful natives on the other were barbarously put to death.

General Blanco was recalled by the Canovas ministry in December, 1896, and General Polivieja, who had made a reputation for energy and cruelty in Cuba, was sent out in his stead.

More troops were sent out until he commanded a land force of 28,000 men.

By the middle of March, 1897, every important native stronghold had been taken and the natives had been broken into detachments. Then Polivieja was permitted to resign and General Rivera was sent out in his stead.

The natives continued the rebellion, avoiding pitched battles, and the Spaniards were as far from destroying the Katipunan as the Katipunan was from subverting the Spanish Government.

A treaty of peace was finally signed December 14, 1897, known as the peace of Biac-na-Bato, whereby, according to Foreman, Aguinaldo and 34 other chiefs agreed to quit the Philippine Islands and not to return without the permission of Spain; and the insurgents were bound to deliver up their arms, to evacuate all places held by them, and to conclude an armistice for three years, during which Spain promised to introduce certain reforms, which the insurgents agreed not to obstruct.

On behalf of Spain, among other things, it is said, it was agreed to pay, through one Pedro A. Paterno, to the insurgents $1,000,000, and to families who had sustained loss by reason of war, though not engaged therein, $700,000, which sums were to be distributed at the discretion of Paterno, subject to conditions proposed by Rivera.

Be this as it may, Aguinaldo and his chiefs went to Hongkong. During two months of nominal peace which followed, 7,000 Spanish troops were sent home. The rebellion was disorganized, but the Government failed to pursue a policy of conciliation, and continued to treat the natives as seditious suspects.

Instead of a general amnesty, as promised, only a few special pardons were granted.

Discontent again blazed into rebellion in the provinces northward of Manila and in the island of Cebu.

In April, 1898, General Rivera was recalled and General Augusti was sent out in his stead.

This was the state of affairs when a little before sunrise on the 1st day of May, 1898, Dewey steamed into the harbor of Manila.

THE AMERICAN OCCUPATION.

In April, 1898, in response to an overwhelming popular demand, without regard to party, this Government declared war against Spain. Our fleet lying at anchor off Hongkong received an order to find and destroy the Spanish squadron in Pacific waters.

On that errand, in the gray of the morning of May 1, 1898, our fleet came softly into the harbor of Manila and when Gridley was ready commenced firing.

After the smoke of battle had cleared away a new power remained to be reckoned with in the Orient and an old power, with its long record of tyranny and bloodshed, was canceled out forever. After the battle of Manila Bay the city of Manila was at the mercy of the American fleet.

Its Spanish inhabitants could have been shelled into submission within a day or driven to extermination at the hands of thousands of hostile natives waiting outside the city to gratify a grudge of long standing.

Aguinaldo had not come on with the American fleet, but remained at Hongkong awaiting the report of three of his former chiefs who had come on with the American fleet to sound the public feeling and prepare the way for his return.

He followed nineteen days later, immediately proclaimed himself dictator, and his old companions rallied to his standard.

Admiral Dewey declared in the report of the first Philippine Commission that "No alliance of any kind was entered into with Aguinaldo, nor was any promise of independence made to him at any time."

This official statement he has many times supplemented by unofficial statements.

On the 23d of June an assembly summoned by Aguinaldo proclaimed a provisional government, and efforts were made to draw our American officers into some sort of recognition of it, the insurgents not understanding that American officers had no power to determine our international relations.

Outside Manila General Merritt was in command of the American land forces, and the insurgents were busy burning villages and churches and skirmishing with the Spaniards.

Aguinaldo had been steadily restrained from attacking Manila and the insurgents deemed themselves slighted by not being invited to cooperate with the Americans against the city.

Frequent altercations began to occur between native and American soldiers, the first rough prelude to the war that was to follow.

On the 12th day of August, 1898, a protocol of peace was signed at Washington, whereby it was provided that the United States should "occupy and hold the city, bay, and harbor of Manila pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace," and that five commissioners should be appointed by each of the contracting Governments to meet at Paris not later than October 1, there to negotiate and conclude a treaty of peace. Next day Manila surrendered to American troops, and thereafter hostilities were suspended.

The treaty of peace was finally signed at Paris December 10, 1898, and six months were allowed for ratification by the respective Governments.

THE INSURRECTION AGAINST AMERICA.

Meanwhile in and about Manila the relations between natives and Americans continued strained.

In considering the Philippine situation at this time it must be borne in mind that the warlike spirit was running high among the natives.

Aguinaldo was issuing frequent proclamations, misrepresenting American intentions.

Native newspapers were inflaming public feeling.

Lying pamphlets were being circulated and demagogic speeches were being made against the United States.

Financial and other encouragement was being given the insurgents from juntas at Hongkong, Paris, and Madrid.

Reports sent out from America that the preponderance of American sympathy was with the insurgents were given wide effect.

The constant irritation between American and Philippine forces was aggravated by insults by Philippine soldiers, which our soldiers were under strict orders not to resent, their forbearance being construed by the Filipinos as cowardice; and the delay of the United States Senate in ratifying the Paris treaty of peace was construed as confirming the highly colored reports sent out from America.

The Paris treaty was finally ratified February 6, 1899, but open warfare was precipitated on the night of February 4 by a native attack upon our lines.

In his letter accepting the nomination for the Presidency in 1900, Mr. McKinley said:

> The papers found in the recently captured archives of the insurgents demonstrate that their attack had been carefully planned for weeks before it occurred. Their unprovoked attack upon our soldiers at a time when the Senate was deliberating upon the treaty shows that no action on our part except surrender and abandonment would have prevented the fighting, and leaves no doubt in any fair mind of where the responsibility rests for the shedding of American blood.

April 11, 1899, the war with Spain was formally and officially ended, but insurrection in the Philippine Islands continued in a desultory way, encouraged up to the election of 1900 by the policy of the political organization headed by Mr. Bryan.

Finally, on the 23d day of March, 1901, the civil reconstruction of the islands being well under way, Aguinaldo was captured, and on April 19 he issued a proclamation advising submission.

IMPERIALISM.

Permit me now to shift the scene and present the political situation in America as it relates to the Philippine Islands.

When a party has a policy to present, it issues a platform. When it has no policy to present, it issues a platform just the same.

As a preliminary to the campaign of 1900, the Kansas City convention issued a platform.

After deliberating two days to determine what should be called the paramount issue, meanwhile searching all persons admitted to the committee room for concealed planks about their persons, the committee on platform finally determined, by a majority of two, that what they called imperialism should be called the paramount issue. But conventions do not make issues. Issues make themselves. Calling a thing the leading issue does not make it the leading issue, and calling a thing imperialism does not make it imperialism.

What gentlemen call imperialism is also called expansion. What gentlemen call imperialism is also called honor and duty. [Applause on the Republican side.] What gentlemen call imperialism is also called a plain, decent exhibition of civilized propriety.

In the campaign which followed the gentlemen on the other side accepted, adopted, and indorsed the Bible, the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, and various other good and reputable persons and publications.

They quoted Thomas Jefferson in one part of their platform, and denounced expansion as a result of the Spanish war, which they had helped to bring on, in another part of their platform, and were proud to claim some sort of political relationship to Thomas Jefferson, which he, being dead, of course could not prevent. [Laughter.]

And yet Thomas Jefferson was at one time in his own judgment an unconstitutional expansionist, also called imperialist, and the Louisiana Purchase was denounced as upsetting the whole equilibrium of our Government.

Notwithstanding this, in a speech to the New York Democratic Club April 14 last, commemorating Thomas Jefferson's birthday, the Hon. David Bennett Hill declared, with that disregard of history which the circumstances probably seemed to him to require, that, "It is safe to believe that Jefferson would never have favored an extension of our jurisdiction which did not carry with it the provisions of our Constitution, to which he was so devotedly attached and which he defended so vigorously with voice and pen."

Andrew Jackson was an expansionist, also called imperialist, of the most pronounced and profane sort, and yet our friends who love to call themselves Andrew Jackson Democrats denounce expansion.

There is no more howling incongruity anywhere in history or fiction than summoning Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson to lend respectability to the policy of antiexpansion, or Abraham Lincoln to bolster the proposition that the Constitution extends itself. Abraham Lincoln did not believe that the Constitution extends itself, and he actively participated in a movement to prevent certain States in the South from seceding from the Union and for their government within the Union without their consent.

However, it is always a good thing to have some good names in the background of an enterprise. They lend an air of respectability to almost any kind of enterprise from eternal-youth delusions to political parties. [Laughter.]

There is no means known to the law whereby an injunction can be obtained against the fraudulent use of eminent names for political purposes.

After the names of great men gone before us have become fixed in the firmament for all time beyond the reach of party strife parties come along and begin to use them for decorative, illustrative, and advertising purposes, like the flag, and tearing a phrase here and there from its setting in their published works, proclaim it as a foretelling and justification of themselves.

In the campaign which followed, gentlemen on the other side denounced William McKinley because they said he was an imperialist.

And yet no man was less imperious or imperial than he.

Sacrificed at last to the propaganda of impersonal murder, he died as he had lived with simple, manly courage, and on the day whereon his body finished its long pilgrimage to the tomb all the wheels of traffic which had received a new impulse from his Administration stood still. There was silence along the rails and the click of the telegraph was hushed, and if men had had ears to hear they might perhaps have heard not only the song on earth, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," but a voice in the realms of Eternity saying, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Now that he is dead, I venture the prediction that it will not be long before gentlemen on the other side will have appropriated his memory to their own uses and will have his picture among their own stage properties and will be quoting his utterances as "apples of gold in pictures of silver," even as they are quoting the utterances of Abraham Lincoln.

Verily the successors and assigns of those who stoned the prophets now burn incense to their memory and garnish the sepulchers of the righteous.

We seldom do men justice until they are dead, and then we make up for the mean lies we tell of them while they are living by the good lies we tell of them after they are dead. [Laughter.]

At the end of the campaign of 1900 the old Populistic party banner, marked Imperialism and 16 to 1, partly obliterated, which had been carried by a procession of discontent, with outriders of necromancers, soothsayers, sword swallowers, serpentine dancers, and experts in curbstone discussion, was dumped in the scrap heap of ineffectual political experiment, but is being fished out and refurbished now for further political use, minus 16 to 1. [Laughter and applause on Republican side.]

THE BEGINNING OF RECONSTRUCTION.

Learned gentlemen, subtle and well skilled in the art of perverting public opinion for political purposes, charge that this Government has waged a war of spoliation in the Philippine Islands and is holding them now with an iron hand. I deny it. The man who says this slanders his Government.

The American flag has come to the people of the Philippine Islands "even as the light of the morning when the sun riseth," and wherever our flag goes the names of Abraham Lincoln and William McKinley go with it as guarantors of its beneficent purposes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Instead of a government of spoliation, we are substituting as rapidly as possible a representative form of government.

Instead of a government of tyranny, we are substituting a government of the largest liberty which the people of the Philippine Islands are capable of sustaining.

After the ratification of the Paris treaty of peace we began the extension of humane and pacific authority for the protection of life and property.

To that end, in January, 1899, the first Philippine Commission was appointed, headed by Hon. J. G. Schurman, of New York, with instructions from William McKinley—

To report "the results of their observations and reflections;"

To exercise respect for native "ideals, customs, and institutions." Does this sound like tyranny?

To emphasize the "just and beneficent intentions of a liberating rather than conquering nation." Does this sound like tyranny?

To offer the "largest measure of local self-government consistent with peace and good order." Is this tyranny?

To "study social conditions and to recommend Executive action."

Do these instructions sound like tyranny? Can you not hear the kindly voice of William McKinley dictating these instructions?

That Commission reported that "whatever the future of the Philippines may be, there is no course open to us now except prosecution of the war until the insurgents are reduced to submission."

They further reported that in their opinion there had never been a time since Dewey steamed into Manila Bay when we could have sailed away with honor to ourselves or safety to the people of the Philippine Islands.

And this I believe is the deliberate judgment of Christendom, no matter what gentlemen on the other side may say for political purposes.

The figure of Dewey on the bridge of the Olympia has taken its place for all time in the world's great gallery of heroic deeds. But if by order of this Government he had sailed away after the fight on the 1st day of May, no port in all the world's long seacoast would have greeted us without derision.

This Government "never struck a blow except for civilization, and never struck its colors." [Applause on the Republican side.]

CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

In March, 1900, William McKinley appointed the second Philippine Commission, with Hon. William H. Taft, of Ohio, as chairman, and directed them to give to the people of the Philippine Islands local self-government so far as "consistent with the maintenance of law, order, and loyalty." Does this sound like tyranny?

The government established by President McKinley was dual, military and civil, and provided for a gradual reduction of military power and a gradual increase of civil power until civil government should be supreme. Accordingly our military power is being rapidly reduced, and within a year will be down to 15,000 men.

Now the acts of this Philippine Commission, "what they have done, are they not written in the book of the chronicles" of golden deeds to be read and applauded by all men for all time?

Have they not already transformed jungles where crouched the unspeakable cruelties of war into places of safety?

Have they not invaded the black jungles of human ignorance where "lust and avarice and anger creep" and laid the foundations of American schoolhouses?

And because there are some jungles left shall we quit the work?

Have they not mapped, platted, surveyed, and systematized disorder into order?

Shall we let order lapse again into disorder?

Are they not the executors of the last will of William McKinley toward the people of the Philippine Islands, and was he not the representative of the will of the American people in this behalf?

I listened to Governor Taft day after day when he appeared before the Insular Committee. I regard him as an absolutely honest man, incapable of misrepresentation. I believe him to be broad-minded and incorruptible; I believe him to be peculiarly qualified for his difficult position, and if you gentlemen on the other side will only give them a chance, I believe he and the Commission of which he is chief will work out a splendid consummation in the Philippine Islands.

Verily, no men ever had nobler work to do and no men ever did their work more nobly than this same Taft Commission. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Instead of a Katipunan, with men signing their names in blood, there is now a Federal party, with Federal committees organized in every town "to secure peace for the Philippine Islands under the American flag." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Insurrection has practically ceased to make war against the sovereignty of the United States and has grasped the hand of amity and friendship extended to it across battlefields where blood was shed because of misunderstanding and misrepresentation of our fair intentions.

Under a law passed pursuant to the direction of the President of the United States, four executive departments have been created:

DEPARTMENTS.

First, a department of the interior, comprehending bureaus of health, quarantine, forestry, mining, agriculture, fisheries, weather, non-Christian tribes, public lands, government laboratories, patents and copyrights.

Second, a department of commerce and police, comprehending bureaus of interisland transportation, post-offices, telegraphs, coast and geodetic survey, public works, constabulary, prisons, light-houses, and corporations except banks.

Third, a department of finance and justice, comprehending bureaus of the treasury, auditor, customs and immigration, internal revenue, storage and ice plant, banks, banking, coinage and currency, and of justice.

Fourth, a department of public instruction, comprehending bureaus of public instruction, public charities, public libraries and museums, statistics, public records, public printing, public buildings, and architecture.

PROVINCES.

Thirty-five provinces have been organized into orderly municipalities, each with its provincial board, composed of a governor, treasurer, and supervisor, with a secretary of the province for its secretary and a prosecuting attorney for its legal adviser.

TOWNS.

Eight hundred towns have been organized into autonomous municipalities, with executive officers and municipal councils, wherein the people elect their own officers, measure their own taxes, and fix the salaries of their own public servants within the limitations of law.

And "it is pertinent to add here," in the language of the message of the Federal party to Congress in November last, "that the commissioners, while traveling about the islands in the organization of these provinces and municipalities, were received everywhere with sincere and splendid manifestations of enthusiasm, demonstrative of the ardent desire to enjoy as soon as may be civil rule."

LAW AND ORDER.

For the preservation of law and order a police force has been provided of not more than 150 natives for each province, with inspectors for each province, under the supervision of a chief at Manila, and 4 assistant chiefs in four grand divisions of the archipelago.

LAWS AND COURTS.

The labyrinth of Spanish laws, violated by power and perverted by subtlety, with its maze of expense, delay, and disappointment, is being superseded by a plain code of American laws, administered by a plain bench of honest judges; by a supreme court, composed of a chief justice and six associate justices (three of the court being Filipinos), holding regular terms at Manila, Iloilo, and Cebu.

By courts of first instance having jurisdiction in fifteen judicial districts, embracing every province in the islands; one-third of the judges whereof are Filipinos.

By courts of justice of the peace, established in every organized municipality in the islands.

THE PHILIPPINE ASSEMBLY.

It is proposed that when "general and complete peace shall have been established there shall be a census taken," and that part of the islands not inhabited by Moros or other non-Christian tribes shall be divided into districts, each of which shall be entitled to elect a delegate, for a term of two years, to a popular assembly of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be known as the Philippine assembly, which shall have legislative sessions commencing on the first Monday in February in each year.

TWO COMMISSIONERS.

Not only are the people of the Philippine Islands to be represented in their own legislative assembly, but the Philippine government is to be represented in the Congress of the United States by two commissioners elected by the people from two grand divisions of the archipelago, who shall be entitled to official recognition here and to the privileges of the floor of both Houses of Congress.

TAXES.

Bearing in mind the injunction of William McKinley, "that provisions for taxation should be simple, so that they may be understood by the people," it is proposed to raise revenue with the least burden upon those least able to stand it, reversing the method pursued by Spain.

PUBLIC LANDS.

It is proposed to establish a public-land system and a survey of lands. Under the Spanish system there was no survey of lands.

Out of about 73,000,000 acres, only about 5,000,000 were owned by individuals. About 400,000 people occupy lands to which they have never been able to obtain title. We propose to give the word "home" a new meaning in the Philippine Islands by the passage of a homestead law whereby a man may own, hold, improve, transfer, or devise some parcel of his native land.

ROADS.

Bridle paths are being converted into broad and permanent highways.

RAILROADS.

It is proposed to encourage the building of railroads and thereby to open communication between provinces, improve the lands, and build up towns along the way.

MINES.

There was no title to mines under Spanish dominion. It is proposed now to pass laws under which shall be developed the rich mineral resources of the islands.

TIMBER.

There are 30,000,000 acres of the most valuable timber lands in the world in these islands which are to be protected and used under proper restrictions.

BANKING AND COINAGE.

Under the Spanish system banks and money lenders took exorbitant toll from every business transaction.

We propose to charter banks now under proper restrictions for the protection and encouragement of trade.

The money of the Philippine Islands now, besides the American money which our pay roll puts in circulation, is:

Mexican silver dollars, containing 377.18 fine grains.

Some Spanish-Filipino dollars, containing less silver of less fineness, but passing current with Mexican silver dollars.

Paper money issued by the Spanish-Filipino Bank and minor coinage.

These Mexican and Spanish Filipino coins pass at less than two for one of American money, and fluctuate from day to day in the markets of the Orient according to the intrinsic value of the silver they contain, although American dollars contain about 6 grains less pure silver than Mexican dollars.

The oriental banker and the oriental merchant ring the Mexican dollar on their counters and say this dollar is worth the silver it contains. For it we will give you 50 cents to-day, but to-morrow it may be worth only 47 cents. Therefore we shall have to charge you enough in goods or exchange to cover fluctuation.

The free and unlimited coinage of American silver dollars there if not backed by the promise of this Government to keep and maintain them at par with gold would result in the same difficulty, because American silver dollars would circulate not at their face value, but at the fluctuating value of the silver they contain.

Therefore this miscellaneous money is to be replaced by coinage measured by the gold standard and suited to the needs, prejudices, and customs of the people.

This coinage is to be of pesos of about the value of our 50-cent piece, divisible into 100 centavos (one-half cent). There are also to be struck and coined 50-centavo pieces, 20-centavo pieces, 10-centavo pieces, and other minor coins, all to be measured by a stable standard of commercial and monetary value and maintained at parity "with the gold money of the United States."

All silver coins are to be coined from "silver bullion produced in the United States, and purchased by the government of the Philippine Islands," including silver in the Treasury of the United States "held in excess of the amount required for the redemption in full of the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of" the act of July 14, 1890.

Some gentlemen urge the American coinage in the Philippine Islands, but to force our coinage there in its entirety at this time would violently change existing prices and add an element of discontent to a situation which we are endeavoring to pacify.

The native is affected by what he sees. Now, he gets 20 centavos for a day's work, perhaps, then he would get 10 cents of equal value theoretically, but in practice he would for a long time get from his employer less money for his day's work and from the merchant less goods for his money.

Besides the introduction of our American dollar maintained at its face value, as it ought to be, would be a constant invitation to counterfeiting when more than 100 per cent could be made on every dollar counterfeited.

Another proposition has found favor in some unexpected quarters, viz, the free and unlimited coinage and use of American silver in the Philippine Islands, backed by no pledge of this Government to keep it at par with gold, intending thereby to make the Philippine Islands the dumping ground of American silver. This proposition is popular with Manila bankers, who want to continue to make money out of fluctuating values.

This nation has pronounced in favor of a dollar true to name and true to the value stamped upon it.

If the gold standard is a good thing here it is a good thing in the Philippine Islands.

If it is a bad thing for our Government to set up a free open hopper into which every owner of silver may dump his silver and have it come out coined into dollars free of charge and carry the dollars away with him without restriction as to the amount coined and without provision to keep and maintain the dollars so coined at fixed value or at parity with gold, then it is a bad thing for the Philippine Islands.

Our dollar is good now the whole world round and the whole year round, and our coinage down to a cent is good as gold everywhere.

Even the Chinese rickshaw man knows and prefers our 5-cent piece to the Chinese 10-cent piece, because he knows it will purchase as much, if not more, even on his own soil, and that its value is unvarying.

The American silver dollar is good because behind every dollar stands this nation's promise to keep and maintain silver and gold at parity, and because by coinage on Government account the Government limits the output of our silver dollars within its powers of redemption. We have set up a stable standard of commercial value here around which our business transactions are carried on. Why is it not a good thing in the Philippine Islands? Shall we add instability to instability?

To flood the Philippine Islands with unstable dollars when we are trying to establish stable conditions there, to flood the Orient with a bastard imitation of our silver dollar, which circulates now upon the faith and credit of a nation which never breaks its word, would, in my opinion, be to discredit our money and our flag in the estimation of the world.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE FLAG.

By the terms of the Paris treaty of peace it was provided that the civil rights and political status of the people of the Philippine Islands should be determined by the Congress of the United States.

"The performance of this international obligation of the United States," as the Federal party of the Philippine Islands declared in its message to the Congress of the United States in November, 1901, "has been deferred to this time because of the unfortunate fact of the Filipinos having attacked the sovereignty of the United States, a hostile act which the Federal party records as having been brought about by misunderstanding and not through hatred of the American sovereignty."

Until the recently rendered decisions of the Supreme Court many people believed, and gentlemen on the other side still insist, with great force and violence, that the "civil rights and political status" of the people of the Philippine Islands came wholly within the scope and limitations of the Constitution of the United States.

Although the verdict and judgment of history and the decisions of the Supreme Court have been entered against this contention, gentlemen on the other side still for a pretense pervert history and say that the Constitution follows the flag and has extended itself automatically, ex proprio vigore, into and over acquired territory.

"The territorial boundaries of the United States do not advance with its successful armies nor retire before an invading foe." The theory that the Constitution follows the flag may be answered by the reductio ad absurdum method.

If the Constitution follows the flag, how much of the Constitution followed the flag into Canada in the war of 1812 and how much remains there?

If the Constitution follows the flag, how much of the Constitution followed the flag into Mexico and how much remains there?

If the Constitution follows the flag, how much of the Constitution followed the flag into Cuba and how much remains there?

If the Constitution follows the flag, how much of the Constitution followed the flag into China and how much remains there?

These questions answer themselves.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will my friend permit me to answer?

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes; proceed.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I simply wanted to say that as much of the Constitution remains there as there does of the flag.

Mr. HAMILTON. But the flag went there, did it not? And you say that the Constitution follows the flag, and you did it to deceive the people. There was not a bit of truth in it.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. But you say the flag stays put.

Mr. HAMILTON. I will tell you what I think about it. Some of you gentlemen on the other side have been busy denouncing the Supreme Court because of that decision ever since it rendered it. Now you will have to tunnel under, climb over, or go around, or perhaps you had better abolish the Supreme Court and draw talesmen from the bystanders. [Laughter on the Republican side.] You said the Constitution extends itself, did you not? That is what you contended. Do you still believe it?

The doctrine that the Constitution extends itself is the old Calhoun doctrine, whereby it was sought to extend the Constitution and thereby slavery over free soil.

It first found expression in the Dred Scott decision, and was afterwards fought out on many battlefields.

The opposite doctrine that the Constitution does not extend itself first found expression in the Republican national platform of 1856, afterwards in the Republican national platform of 1860, on which Abraham Lincoln was nominated and elected; and for that doctrine he finally died.

It is matter of common historic knowledge that the Constitution did not follow the flag into Jefferson's Louisiana purchase, nor into Florida, but was extended there by legislation framed for that purpose, just as we have always extended the Constitution by legislative enactment into territories which we have acquired and created since.

If the Constitution does not extend itself in one instance it does not extend itself in any instance because it must act by inevitable rule in every instance.

It was said that the Constitution had extended itself into and over the Philippine Islands and that the Philippine Islands had thereby become an integral part of the Union, and at the same time, as a part of the same party policy, it was proposed to withdraw the Constitution from the Philippine Islands and extend a sort of quasi Monroe doctrine there instead.

But if the Constitution extends itself and you can not control it in its extension, how can you control it by withdrawing it?

In the view of the advocates of automatic constitutional extension it would appear that the Constitution is uncontrollably elastic in extension but controllably elastic in contraction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen contended, however, that the Constitution had extended itself automatically ex proprio vigore into and over the Philippine Islands and that the Philippine Islands had thereby become an integral part of the Union.

But if the Philippine Islands have become an integral part of the Union, we being another part of the Union, then can a part of the whole dispose of another part of the whole in its relation to the whole?

And if one part of the whole can dispose of another part of the whole in its relation to the whole, then does it not follow that a part can dispose of itself in its relation to the whole; and if a part can dispose of itself in its relation to the whole, where are the bonds that bind the Union?

Verily our friends have been getting close to some fundamental questions which were supposed to be settled as far back as 1865.

A STABLE FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

If any man says we went to war with Spain for territory he slanders his Government. We went to war with Spain for a cause unique in history—the cause of humanity; and above the graves of thousands of reconcentrados starved to death by Weyler's order, above the harbor where the Maine lies buried, we have erected the monument of Cuba reorganized, regenerated, and free.

Now, you gentlemen who brought on the war while McKinley was getting things ready for Gridley to fire; you gentlemen who at long range inspired our troops, enlightened our officers, and otherwise generally brought the war to a glorious close by talk, was it your idea that we could go to war without results?

Incident to that war we acquired Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands; but we could only have acquired them by a treaty of peace, which had to be ratified by the United States Senate by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, and the United States Senate was then controlled by Democrats, Populists, and Silver Republicans, who consented to ratification by and with the advice and consent of William Jennings Bryan.

If gentlemen did not want these islands, why did they vote to acquire them?

Having voted to acquire these islands, you declared in your Kansas City platform that you were opposed to acquiring and holding distant islands in the sea. When did you change? [Applause on the Republican side.]

In that same platform, having voted to acquire these islands, and having declared in your platform that you were opposed to acquiring them, you proposed a declaration of the nation's purpose to give to the people of the Philippine Islands a stable form of government.

In that same platform you proposed protection from outside influence, such as you say, we give now to the States of South and Central America.

All this means, if it means anything, that you propose to stay long enough and keep soldiers enough to set up a so-called stable form of government upon the shifting sands of barbaric and oriental intrigue and inexperience, and then sail away while your so-called stable form of government is falling down.

To do this would require the same military force which we now have, with which we are setting up a stable government in the Philippine Islands; but this you denounce as militarism and refuse to vote for shelter for our soldiers there.

To do this would require the same kind of a commission which we now have, with which we are setting up and standing by a stable government there, and this you denounce as imperialism.

SOME INCONSISTENCIES.

It is hard to please you folks anyhow. In one breath you denounce these islands as the hotbed of disorder and its inhabitants as incapable of self-government. In the next you refer to them as fecund with freedom.

You vote to annex them and straightway you denounce annexation as a crime.

You vote to take possession of them and straightway you propose to abandon them.

You hang on the flanks of our army with criticism.

If we put down insurrection, you criticise our method of putting down insurrection. If we do not put down insurrection, you criticise our failure to put down insurrection.

If we capture Aguinaldo, you criticise our method of capturing Aguinaldo. If we do not capture Aguinaldo, you criticise our failure to capture Aguinaldo.

If some soldier goes wrong, you multiply him by one hundred or one thousand and herald the news. You riot in stories of looting and ravage.

Out of party prejudice, pessimism, and guesswork you create hobgoblins with mane and tail erect and claws extended. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Some gentlemen with exaggerated vocabularies have gained such notoriety out of denouncing our soldiers and officers in the field, in the camp, in the trenches, and on the long march in the glaring sun, the chilly night, the drenching dew, and the tropic rain, that their names have been filed among the archives of their party as Presidential possibilities.

Of such stuff are Presidential possibilities made in certain quarters!

I uphold no soldier who goes wrong. I leave his case to the duly constituted authorities.

But I submit that the politician who seeks to promote his party or himself by filing a list of offenses committed by individual soldiers here and there in an army of forty thousand men in scattered army posts, laying stress on the worst and concealing the rigor of their punishment, closely approaches the demagogue; and the demagogue, by consensus of public opinion, is scarcely as respectable as the man who goes wrong under temptation fighting for his country's flag. [Applause on the Republicanside.]

Perhaps I am prejudiced—I would be ashamed of myself if I were not. [Laughter.]

If these gentlemen were carrying out their plans of establishing government in the Philippine Islands with an army recruited under a Democratic Administration is it to be supposed their forces would be any more moral on that account?

It makes a man mad to have to argue this sort of thing.

Our Army is neither Democratic nor Republican. It is the Army of the Republic, composed of Democrats and the sons of Democrats, Republicans and the sons of Republicans—American citizens who are the best all-round men who walk the earth to-day or ever did walk the earth or carry arms.

Meanwhile, please God, we are going straight on to the consummation of a splendid duty. [Applause on Republican side.]

If it were not for turning back the shadow on the dial of progress it would be interesting to see how you would act if responsibility were thrust upon you.

You propose in your platform, "first, a stable form of government; second, independence, and third, a protectorate."

If you mean by "a stable form of government" the shell of a government, the "balloon frame" of a government, to be occupied by a people incapable of independent self-government, then you are guilty of proposing a cheap evasion of duty.

If you do not mean this, but actually mean a stable government, then you are guilty of gross inconsistency in hampering efforts to that end.

If you mean to play on the word "form," then you are guilty of pettifogging in the presence of a tremendous responsibility.

If by independence you mean to take down our flag and sail away, leaving the people to take care of themselves, no party in the Philippine Islands demands this and our duty demands the contrary.

To do so would be to leave them without an army, without a navy, without money, without credit, without schools, without experience, and with the Friar lands problem still unsettled.

If by a protectorate you mean to extend a sort of quasi Monroe doctrine 7,000 miles out in the Pacific and to guarantee these islands against foreign intervention without having a word to say about their foreign policy, and to guarantee them against domestic discord without power to interfere to prevent domestic discord, you propose the impossible.

Again I quote from the message of the Philippine Federal party to Congress. They say:

> Philippine independence with or without a protectorate means the holding of power by all the terrible elements of the sects which predominate and would predominate still for some years until the anger of Filipinos toward Filipinos shall have been completely calmed, education become more general, and the fanaticism we have inherited from Spain exiled.

You are no more logical in Congress than you are in your platform and on the stump.

Your Senate minority bill proposes one thing. Your House minority bill proposes another thing.

Both bills propose that miscellaneous peoples without cohesion and without experience shall frame a constitution and a government for themselves. In one case they are to do this at once. In the other, we are to stay eight years and show them how to set up a stately imitation of the edifice of our Government, and then take down our flag from its lath and plaster imitation dome and sail away, while warring tribes wander through its deserted corridors. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I understand that the gentlemen on the other side have gotten together and hit upon a four-year abandonment plan, to take effect in four years. Our friends on the other side are quick workmen. They can build a constitution and establish a government to meet the phases of veering opinion whenever it is necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi rose.

Mr. HAMILTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to ask the gentleman two questions in one.

Mr. HAMILTON. Well, you had better put them one at a time. I do not like two in one.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will put them both together, so you can answer them together. Is not the gentleman absolutely aware of the fact that the minority members in the Senate and the House have introduced identically the same bill?

Mr. HAMILTON. Finally they have. Now put your other question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is not the gentleman absolutely aware of the fact that in neither of those bills—I mean that in that bill——

Mr. HAMILTON. Which bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In the bill which they have introduced, which is identical in both Houses, there is not a clause nor a sentence, and in neither of the bills proposed by individuals to be introduced in the two Houses is there a sentence or a clause, that does not surrender to the Philippine people, during the temporary government itself, without waiting for the permanent government, the control of their own affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON. Now, I answered the gentleman's first question before he put it. The gentleman from Mississippi, who is pretty candid when he is not suffering from his political environment—and he frequently does—will admit——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Permit me to say that you always suffer from yours.

Mr. HAMILTON. Not to anywhere nearly as great an extent as my able and learned and facile friend on the other side. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now, my friend asked me to admit something, and I will put him in the business of admitting a little. Some of you gentlemen of the minority members of the Insular Committee framed an elaborate government on an eight-year abandonment plan, did you not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; there was no eight-year abandonment plan. It is a plan of immediate abandonment and a plan of eight years' autonomy and self-government in the Philippine Islands, during which we were to control only their foreign affairs, and at the expiration of that time complete autonomy as to their foreign affairs as well as to their domestic affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. So that there was no eight-year abandonment plan.

Mr. HAMILTON. Yes, it is an abandonment plan. You proposed in your minority bill, which was obviously framed, permit me to say, merely for political effect and not for practical use, because you abandoned it so promptly—that did provide for staying there eight years to show them how to set up a stable form of government.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not want to misrepresent——

Mr. HAMILTON. Certainly not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That plan to which you refer—which you call the minority plan—did not provide for our staying there eight years. It provided only that during that time we should appoint a president for them, with a veto power upon their foreign affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is practically staying there.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But our troops were to be withdrawn at once.

Mr. HAMILTON. They are being withdrawn now, are they not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They were to be totally withdrawn.

Mr. HAMILTON. Well, now, I want to ask you a question or two while you are on your feet. You proposed in your Kansas

Democratic platform a stable form of government, did you not, for the Filipinos?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON. How would you set up your stable form of government there without soldiers?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I will tell you how.

Mr. HAMILTON. Please do.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The spirit of William McKinley, which has been so much exploited lately for partisan purposes, has made your answer in Cuba. He managed to set up a stable government there, and you, after he died, withdrew the soldiers from Cuba in pursuance of the policy which he had outlined. Now I will tell you how you could do it in the Philippines.

Mr. HAMILTON. You have not done it yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. By simply announcing to the people there that you did not intend to make war upon their independence and freedom, and that you did intend to give them what God has given them—the right to independence and freedom—and then by withdrawing your soldiers. There is no anarchy in Cuba to-day. We have withdrawn our soldiers there and we have set up a stable government there.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would rather you would not make a speech in the middle of mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We set up a stable government in Cuba and we did not pin it to Cuba with bayonets, either, and we do not propose to pin a stable government to the Filipinos with bayonets. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Well, I was guilty of contributory negligence in getting that injected into the middle of my speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You suggested it.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Mississippi ought to recognize, because I pay tribute to the gentleman's intellect, the vast difference between the conditions in Cuba and in the Philippine Islands, as I already have recognized in what I have said. Now I will yield no further.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Except what we have created, there is no other difference.

Mr. HAMILTON. There is a vast difference, but it is not necessary to bandy words further about this.

I say, and I commend it to the careful consideration of fair men—I do not care what party you belong to, this idea will appeal to your fairness—that only time and education can prepare the people of the Philippine Islands for a stable form of government. A vast difference exists between Cuba and the Philippine Islands. In the Philippine Islands are 84 tribes—3 civilized Christian tribes—with only 10 per cent of the population educated in any degree. It stands to reason it ought to appeal to the judgment of any fair man that that kind of an illiterate population is absolutely incompetent and incapable of establishing for itself a constitution and setting up a government for itself in four years or even eight years.

I submit that the opinion of Governor Taft—than whom there is no fairer man in the United States or out of the United States—is entitled to a great deal of consideration in this connection. I put the opinion of Governor Taft over against the opinion of my friend from Mississippi. The conditions are entirely dissimilar, and I submit that the gentleman knows it; but the gentleman can not possibly own up to it, because it would deprive his party of some campaign material and ammunition the next time they want it. It might be because some one would have to meet an admission against interest on the floor of Congress.

Only a stable people can make a stable government. Our own Capitol is only a symbol of the stability of our Government. You may build your capitol of granite and plant its foundation on everlasting rock, and it will count for nothing if the people who come and go therein are without cohesion and a common purpose. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Only time and education can make a stable government in the Philippine Islands, and we can not look forward into the future and say arbitrarily when it will be done. With all due deference to the gentlemen who propose this four-year plan, it seems to me a political makeshift not intended to do duty in the Philippine Islands, but to serve for political purposes here.

FEEDING THE FIRE.

We are doing something better than setting up a cardboard government on quicksand, then putting up a notice to other nations to keep off the islands while we sail away, and the cardboard government goes down in a carnival of blood and crime.

We are doing our best to establish a stable government there with local self-government as rapidly as the people are able to receive it.

And one of the chief difficulties in the way of restoration of order in the Philippine Islands has come from just such gentlemen as the gentleman from Mississippi and the platform makers, vaticinators, and vacillators who inspired the Kansas City platform and who are now engaged in collecting débris for another platform.

In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress Christian is taken into a room where he sees some one throwing water on fire, but the more water is thrown on the fire the hotter it burns. He is unable to understand this until he is taken around behind a partition where he sees some one feeding the fire with oil.

In the progress of this Government toward putting down insurrection in the Philippine Islands some one has been feeding the fire with oil.

You know who has been doing this. The American people know who has been doing this. General Lawton knew who had been doing this when, a month before his death by a Filipino bullet, he wrote John Barrett:

> I would to God that the truth of this whole Philippine situation could be known by everyone in America. * * * If I am shot by a Filipino bullet, it might as well come from one of my own men * * * because I know from my own observations, confirmed by stories of captured prisoners, that the continuance of fighting is chiefly due to reports sent out from America.

That is what General Lawton wrote John Barrett, and if some of you gentlemen on the other side ever get right with history you will have to bribe the historian. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

PUBLIC OPINION WILL PERMIT NO WRONG.

The logical effect of the theory of self-acting constitutional extension or of the theory that we ought to extend the Constitution at once is that the inhabitants of acquired territory would be immediately admitted to full fellowship within the Union with the people of the Territories thereof. For this the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are not yet fit.

The theory of independence under a protectorate presumes the power of maintaining some form of stable government. For this the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are not yet prepared.

It is axiomatic that all nations in all stages of development are not prepared for the same degree of popular government. "You can only give to an institution that which is in the people."

Our Government is the result of evolution through feudalism, free cities, and monarchy, up to democracy. It is the growth of centuries. Its beginnings were obscure, and finally converged in the struggle for American independence. Every step of our advance has been debated, and some steps are blood stained.

The population of the Philippine Islands is "civilized, semi-civilized, enlightened, and barbaric."

We can not ingraft the twentieth century upon the sixteenth century; neither can we galvanize the sixteenth century into twentieth century conditions.

The years that lie between are years of wonderful growth which can not be bridged in a single year. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Without reasoning as to why it is so, it is so that the conscience of the world is reaching the point where might does not make right, but imposes upon the mighty the responsibility of ascertaining what is right and of doing right.

Public opinion sits above constitutions, courts, and Congresses. It makes and unmakes them. They are the means through which it expresses itself.

While we may not extend the Constitution to undeveloped and unqualified peoples, the public opinion of this country is such that it will not only not permit wrong to be done to them, but the public opinion of this country is of such quality that it will not be satisfied with less than our best endeavors for their welfare.

These are the islands and these are the problems which the strange mutations of time have brought to us.

We are trying to do what no other nation ever tried to do before. We are trying to give to a detached and undeveloped people local self-government under the tutelage and protection of a great world power. We are giving them more than a formal protectorate. We are trying to protect them from themselves within and from invasion without that they may grow in peace and prosperity. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The scope of our activity, as well as of our responsibility, has widened tremendously within the last four years, but so far America has lived up to the highest ideals of her best citizenship.

The American ship of state has sailed uncharted seas within the last four years. We have not passed this way before, but wherever we have been it is cause for everlasting glory that we have made things better because we have been there. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, the object being to consider a conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2295, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the sundry civil bill, and ask unanimous consent to consider it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, asks unanimous consent to take up conference report on the sundry civil bill for the purpose of considering the same now. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask my friend a question. What was done with the Senate amendment in regard to the memorial bridge?

Mr. CANNON. It is not agreed to.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand the gentleman from Illinois wishes to consider this matter now. I think the friends of the memorial bridge desire a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. CANNON. That will be all right.

Mr. RIXEY. But if it is considered now, shall we have to have a vote upon it now?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and I think it is important to consider it now, because gentlemen are all desirous to get away. This is not a complete agreement, and the object of reporting it back was to consider all such questions as attention might be called to, so that when we return it is hoped we can close up the matter.

Mr. RIXEY. Can not this proposition go over until to-morrow morning, because there is rather a slim House now.

Mr. CANNON. It could, but at the same time it is important that we should hold the conference to-night or to-morrow morning at the latest upon this bill. Gentlemen understand the universal desire to get away. We all hope to get away in a few days.

Mr. CLARK. About when?

Mr. CANNON. I hope before the 4th of July.

Mr. RIXEY. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that while I dislike to object, I shall have to do so. At present it is a slim House, and when this matter comes up for a vote I should like to have a fair expression of views.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's proposition may fare better to-morrow than to-day, and he has the power to object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, as a friend of this measure, I suggest that inasmuch as there is another proposition coming from the committee on the question, and as other questions must go over, why not let this matter go over until to-morrow?

Mr. RIXEY. Will they give us an opportunity to vote upon it?

Mr. CANNON. I can make no promises. It shall be my earnest effort to secure an agreement, if I should be on the conference further with the Senate, and a final agreement, I hope. I want to be entirely frank with the gentleman.

Mr. RIXEY. But the gentleman does not give us any assurance that we shall have a vote on the proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I am ready to have a vote now as soon as we can reach it.

Mr. RIXEY. I do not wish to take the whole responsibility, Mr. Speaker, and if the gentleman from Ohio, who is a friend of the measure, is willing to have it go over, I am willing to take his view of the matter as to whether we should insist or not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If there should be an agreement brought here to-morrow, and in that agreement there was adverse action on the question, we would still have a right to vote on it.

Mr. CANNON. But you would have to vote down the conference report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will let this go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CANNON. There is another matter to follow, and these matters will save two days' time in the length of the session if they are considered now.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object, but I think I shall have to.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this matter has been submitted and that there was no objection, and the stenographer's notes will bear me out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not wish to cut off an objection, and objection is made by the gentleman from Tennessee. The report and statement will be printed under the rule.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13123) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 15, 48, 49, 50, 55, 59, 64, 84, 85, 87, 88, 94, 99, 100, 102, 112, 113, 114, 118, 119, 121, 122, 124, 125, 128, 137, 151, 152, 153, 154, 157, 159, 172, 174, 178, 179, 183, and 199.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 8, 11, 22, 26, 31, 46, 47, 52, 53, 60, 61, 62, 63, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 83, 86, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 95, 96, 97, 98, 101, 103, 104, 105, 106, 108, 109, 111, 115, 116, 117, 123, 129, 130, 131, 135, 136, 138, 139, 140, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 155, 156, 158, 162, 163, 164, 165, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 173, 176, 180, 181, 182, 184, 187, 188, 189, 190, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, and 198, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "site," in line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "covering ten acres, more or less;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 12 of the bill, after line 7, insert the following:

"ADDITIONAL FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

"Toward amounts requisite for public buildings, including contracts authorized under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes,' approved June 6, 1902, and amendments thereof, namely: Under the provisions and limitations of section 1 of said act, as follows:

On Nos. 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, and 167, relating to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, appropriates, as proposed by the Senate, $30,000 for a new barrack at Togus, Me., and $500 additional for clerical services for managers.

On No. 168: Appropriates $50,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $45,000, as proposed by the House, for defending suits in claims against the United States.

On Nos. 169 and 170: Authorizes, as proposed by the Senate, the use of not exceeding $1,000 out of the appropriation for the defense of suits before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, for the purchase of books.

On No. 171: Appropriates $5,000, instead of $3,000, as proposed by the House, for traveling expenses of judges and clerks in the district of Alaska.

On No. 172: Appropriation for counsel to the Mission Indians $1,000 instead of $500, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 173: Authorizes the employment by the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission of two commissioners at $2,500 each, and the employment of an assistant clerk at $2,000 and a clerk at $1,400 in lieu of two clerks now in the service.

On No. 174: Strikes out the appropriation of $6,000 proposed by the Senate for salary of additional judge in the second circuit, the same being provided for in the general deficiency bill.

On No. 175: Requires that from and after June 30, 1903, all fees and costs in extradition cases shall be paid out of appropriations for the judiciary.

On No. 176: Appropriates $203,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $185,000, as proposed by the House, for regular assistants to United States district attorneys.

On No. 177: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate with reference to the fees of clerks of United States district and circuit courts, and limits the amount to be received from attorneys for admission to not exceeding $1 instead or $5.

On No. 178: Strikes out the appropriation proposed by the Senate of $1,000 for rent of rooms for the accommodation of the courts at each of the towns of Athens, Ga., and Rome, Ga.

On No. 179: Strikes out the restriction proposed by the Senate as to the expenses of judges of the circuit courts of appeals when on duty outside the State of their residence.

On No. 180: Appropriates $725,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $650,000, as proposed by the House, for support of United States prisoners.

On No. 181: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate authorizing the care and medical treatment of guards who may be injured by prisoners at the Leavenworth Penitentiary.

On Nos. 182, 183, and 184: Strikes out the appropriation of $50,000 proposed by the Senate for demarcation and mapping of the boundary line between the United States and Canada, and appropriates $5,000, as proposed by the Senate, for inspection and repair of monuments marking the boundary between the United States and Mexico.

On Nos. 187, 188, 189, and 190, relating to the Senate: Provides for special payments to three employees of the Senate, and appropriates $1,800 for rent for storage of public documents of the Senate.

On No. 192: Authorizes, as proposed by the Senate, the employment of E. D. Turnure as a watchman in the Dome of the Capitol.

On Nos. 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, and 199, relating to public printing and binding: Appropriates $5,257,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $5,035,000, as proposed by the House, for printing and binding for Congress and the several departments; strikes out the provision proposed by the House to credit the appropriation for printing for the Library of Congress with the proceeds of sales of copies of card indexes, and restores the provision proposed by the House authorizing the purchase of manifold material for duplicating process and patented devices for filing money-order statements by the Public Printer on the requisition of heads of departments.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the following amendments, namely:

On No. 1, for a hall of records in Washington;

On No. 13, appropriating $20,000 for a quarantine station at Portland, Me.;

On Nos. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, and 44, making appropriations, as proposed by the Senate, for sundry light-house and fog-signal stations;

On No. 120, appropriating $25,000 for additional land for Fort Constitution, N. H.;

On Nos. 141, 142, and 143, increasing the appropriation for military posts from $1,500,000 to $1,800,000;

On No. 160, appropriating $100,000 for a memorial bridge across the Potomac River;

On No. 185, appropriating $25,000 for statistics of marriage and divorce;

On No. 186, for the employment of two commissioners to examine and report with reference to railway systems in South and Central America in connection with an intercontinental railway, in accordance with the recommendation of the Pan-American Conference; and

On No. 191, appropriating $3,000 for busts of the late Senators Morrill and Voorhees.

The bill as passed by the Senate appropriated $56,361,504.13, being an increase of $6,547,808.40 over the amount carried as it was passed by the House. Of this sum, the committee of conference recommend that $1,210,286 be stricken out and that $4,053,572.40 be agreed to. The amendments upon which the conference committee have been unable to agree involve the appropriation of $1,283,950. There is added to the bill, under authority of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, $4,995,450 for new public buildings. The items reduced or stricken from the bill by Senate amendments and restored by the conference and certain items increased by the conference committee aggregate $353,141; so that the bill in its present status appropriates $60,499,709.13, of which sum $1,283,950 is involved in amendments upon which no agreement has been reached.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. JACKSON of Kansas obtained leave of absence for one week, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GRIFFITH, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Allen W. Philips, Fifty-sixth Congress, no adverse report having been made.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as Speaker pro tempore for this evening's session the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. CURRIER.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill making appropriations for the Army, in order that it may be considered in the House with a view of offering a resolution.

The SPEAKER. This matter does not require unanimous consent. The bill has reached the state of disagreement and is privileged. The gentleman can call it up at once.

Mr. HULL. I do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] calls up the Army appropriation bill, with the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HULL. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk. I do this in deference to the action of the House upon a former occasion and with the hope that the adoption of this resolution may bring the two Houses together.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12804 numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, and request a conference thereon.

That the House adhere to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 13 and 14.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"And whenever in the opinion of the President the lands and improvements, or any portion of them, of the military posts or reservations at Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., have become undesirable for military purposes he may, in his discretion, cause the same to be appraised and sold at public sale at not less than the appraised value, either as a whole or in subdivisions, under such regulations as to public notice and terms and conditions of sale as he may prescribe, and the proceeds to be deposited in the Treasury. And a sum of money not exceeding the proceeds of such sale or sales at each of such places respectively is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of such lands at or in the vicinity of Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., respectively, as may be required for military purposes, and for building barracks or quarters on such lands to be devoted to military purposes; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make such purchases of lands for the establishment of military posts at or in the vicinity of such places, respectively."

Mr. HULL. The House, I think, is familiar with the condition of affairs in regard to this subject. This matter was up some weeks ago, and the House adopted instructions in regard to certain amendments and asked for a conference. The Senate ignores that action of the House, and the bill comes back to the House, simply asking on the part of the Senate a conference. This resolution further insists on our disagreement to all amendments except three. On two of those amendments, Nos. 13 and 14, we adhere, which is, as I understand, the highest form of expressing our determination to never give up the position of the House on those amendments. The other amendment, No. 15, we propose to agree to with an amendment, so that this particular question, if this resolution should pass and the Senate agree to our action, will be taken out of the conference entirely as having been agreed to by the action of the two Houses. It eliminates the three amendments on which instructions have been voted from the conference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when it is hoped the two Houses will get together on this bill. There are only a few more days of this fiscal year, and this action is taken with the sincere hope that within a few days from this time this bill may become a law. If there is no gentleman desiring to be heard——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand that the course now proposed to be taken is to ask for a conference with the Senate upon the amendments pending to the bill.

Mr. HULL. Only on certain amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. So I understand; but we ask for the conference?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And the message that now goes to the Senate goes with a request for a conference?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is the action now proposed?

Mr. HULL. That is right.

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to ask what has become of that committeee appointed to go over and confab with the Senate and beat it down?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I beg to say that I am one of the minority. I see the able chairman of that conference committee in his seat, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. I respectfully refer the question to him. I hope he will answer.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the special committee.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I will say, in answer to my friend from Missouri, that the committee has had several conferences, some informal and one formal conference, at which we debated and redebated the subject, occupying some three or four hours. We have never been able to agree. The Senate committee adheres to its support of what it regards as parliamentarily proper under the circumstances, and the House committee has adhered to what it believes to be the proper parliamentary position.

Mr. CLARK. This proposition that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] makes is a square backdown from the decision of the House committee when the committee was appointed on which was the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. DALZELL. Nothing of the kind; there is no backdown about it.

Mr. CLARK. What is it, then? Does it not surrender the very question that the gentleman from Illinois raised that morning when that committee was appointed?

Mr. DALZELL. On the contrary, it goes one step further, and, instead of referring that proposition to our committee of conference with instructions, we take the matter up in the House ourselves and announce the determination here. In other words, we say that we adhere to our disagreement to amendments 13 and 14 and recede from our disagreement to 15 with an amendment, which preserves our original attitude as to amendment 15. There is no backdown, but, on the contrary, we keep precisely the same situation that we had before.

Mr. CLARK. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] which was the number of the amendment that he raised the question on?

Mr. DALZELL. I will explain the situation to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK. Very well.

Mr. DALZELL. The Senate sent over the military appropriation bill with certain amendments. We disagreed to all the amendments and instructed our conferees not to report an agreement on amendments 13, 14, and 15, and we sent the instructions over in the message that announced the appointment of the conferees. The Senate took umbrage at that action and said we ought not to have told them that we had instructed our conferees. As a means of reconciling the differences between the two Houses upon the parliamentary situation, they appointed a committee to pass on the question, not of the amendments, but of the message, and we appointed a like committee, and in the meantime the bill has been lying on the Senate table.

Now, then, wholly ignoring our first message and the announcement that we had appointed conferees, the Senate sends that bill back here to-day, further insisting on its disagreement and asks for a conference. Instead of appointing conferees and instructing them as we did in the first instance, we simply ask for a conference and say that as to 13 and 14, as to which the instructions were given, we adhere. That is to say, we take the last parliamentary step that can be taken. We announce that we will not agree to 13 and 14.

Mr. CLARK. The conferees, then, have nothing to do with these two amendments?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. They are not in conference.

Mr. CLARK. What about amendment No. 15?

Mr. DALZELL. We recede as to that with an amendment, which preserves our original attitude with respect to it.

Mr. CANNON. That is not in conference.

Mr. DALZELL. No.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do you not eliminate from Senate amendment 15 all that part to which reference was made in the House through our instructions?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. So that the amendment which is preserved in this resolution as to amendment 15 of the Senate is that part of Senate amendment 15 which was not referred to in the original resolution of the House giving the instructions.

Mr. DALZELL. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in addition to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, or if he said it he did not make it perfectly clear as I understood it, I would state that the Senate disregards, in sending the military appropriation bill here to-day, our message to them wherein we instructed our conferees as to amendments 13, 14, and 15. The Senate ignores that message and sends the bill here and asks for a full and free conference. Now, to be perfectly frank with the House, if we pass the motion which was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] the House of Representatives ignores their message which they sent here to-day with this bill.

Mr. DALZELL. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Asking for a conference full and free. We ignore that, just as the Senate ignored us, and we send the bill back with the action which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois takes. That is, we send the bill to them, appoint conferees, but adhere to amendments 13 and 14 and take them out of the conference and tell our conferees in effect that they can not consider 13 and 14 and that as to 15 we will agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment which has been read at the desk. Now, that is the situation.

Mr. DALZELL. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not think we backed down from our position. If I had thought so I would never have agreed to this proposition.

Mr. ZENOR. I want to make an inquiry. I am not completely advised as to the amendments relating to the authorization of sale of the arsenal grounds at Indianapolis, Buffalo, and elsewhere. I want to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether, if his motion is carried, it will carry these provisions into conference again?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; if my resolution is adopted, the result will be that we have agreed to the Senate amendment in regard to the sale of the land at Buffalo and Columbus and Indianapolis, and authorized the reinvestment of the fund in the vicinity of those places.

Mr. ZENOR. In the discretion of the Secretary of War?

Mr. HULL. In the discretion of the Secretary of War; yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Provided the Senate agrees to our amendment.

Mr. HULL. Oh, certainly; but so far as the House is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HULL, Mr. CAPRON, and Mr. HAY.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent to consider the conference report on the sundry civil bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] again asks unanimous consent to consider now the conference report on the sundry civil bill. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we announced that we objected, for good reasons, as we think.

Mr. CANNON. I hoped that my friend had repented.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER. Under the order, the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2295), the Philippine government bill, with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] in the chair.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the special features of either the majority or minority bills presented further than to say that one proposes to hold the islands of the Philippine Archipelago as colonies and their people as subjects, while the other proposes to grant independence, which has been the aspiration of the people and for which they have made so many sacrifices.

Neither of the great political parties desires to incorporate the islands as a part of the body politic, but it is proposed by one to retain possession and govern them under laws by Congress without reference to the Constitution, while the other insists that, if retained, constitutional rights and guaranties should accompany the possession, or, if this be undesirable, independence should be given as a matter of justice to the people there and as the only consistent course for our Government to pursue.

No greater question has ever confronted the American people for wise solution, and it is well worthy of the attention of the best thought of the country.

The step which we are now about to take will determine the status of a distant people over whom we asserted sovereignty by virtue of purchase and which we now claim is absolute at the end of a protracted, costly, and disheartening war. We are about to decide upon and define a policy of government which commits us to the Old World idea of colonization, under which other peoples are held, to be governed by such laws as unlimited and unrestrained power may enact for their control.

In the history of our American Republic this is the first departure from the heretofore strictly guarded principle of government—that we can not hold countries or peoples without constitutional restraints—and marks the time in our national life when we have left the true and proper boundaries of constitutional domain to wander in other fields amid new and unfamiliar scenes.

It is well for the American people to pause and seriously consider whether extended empire over an alien people separated from us by an ocean of distance is so desirable that they are prepared for the sacrifice.

I listened with interest to the eloquent gentleman who preceded me [Mr. HAMILTON], and heard him invoke the reputation and splendid name of Abraham Lincoln as yet the guide and inspiration of the Republican party.

I invoke these words of Abraham Lincoln as his protest to the claim:

> Those arguments that are made that the inferior race are to be treated with as much allowance as they are capable of enjoying, that as much is to be done for them as their condition will allow—what are these arguments? They are the arguments that kings have made for enslaving the people in all ages of the world. They always bestrode the necks of the people, not that they wanted to do it, but because the people were better off for being ridden. That is their argument. Turn it whatever way you will; whether it comes from the mouth of a king as an excuse for enslaving the people of his country, or from the mouths of men of one race as a reason for enslaving the men of another race, it is all the same old serpent.

If these sentiments are good Republican doctrine, what latter-day imperialist can there find his defense or justification for holding men as subjects?

The fact is that the Republican party as now constituted has turned the picture of the martyr President to the wall. It has dishonored his teachings. It conjures with his name, but denies all that he stood for. It invokes at the tomb, but when the spirit of the dead arises it shudders and flees like a guilty thing.

It uses the "arguments of kings" when it speaks of human rights.

It stands for industrial slavery at home and protects human slavery in the Philippine Islands.

It prates of the flag, but its policy dishonors it.

It would found a splendid empire on the ruins of constitutional liberty. Abraham Lincoln has given the Republican party a definition of imperialism.

HOW THE TWO PARTIES STAND.

The treaty of Paris was negotiated by five American Commissioners—all Republicans named by a Republican President.

It was ratified by a Republican Senate.

It left the political status and the civil rights of the United States to be determined by the American Congress.

While a few Democratic Senators voted in the affirmative on the question of ratification, the majority opposed it; those favoring ratification did so upon the ground that it would end at once all differences with Spain; that the situation could then be treated dispassionately, believing that the future of the archipelago would be determined in a manner consonant with our past history.

The Bacon resolution, which promised independence to the people of the islands, was supported with practical unanimity by the Democratic Senators, while the Republican Senators, with one exception, opposed it.

It was the policy of the Democratic party to favor that resolution. It was the policy of the Republican party to oppose it.

It was the policy of the Democratic party to bestow liberty upon the Philippine people. It was the policy of the Republican party to deny it.

If this resolution had passed, war would not have been possible. It would have met the aspiration of a people who had struggled for liberty, and carried untold blessing instead of untold misery. For all, therefore, which followed the Republican party is alone responsible. If there has been glory in the Philippine Islands it should enjoy it; if there has been shame and disgrace it must bear the burden.

If the Democratic policy had been declared there would have been no war of extermination waged, no orders of desolation, no devastated country. More than a hundred thousand Filipinos, slain in their native land, fighting with blind devotion in what they believed was a sacred cause, would be alive to bless the great Republic.

There would have been no reprisals by American soldiers, no violation of the rules of civilized war, no torture of helpless prisoners, no blot upon the honor of American arms.

If the Democratic policy had prevailed there would have been no standing army, no hundreds of millions spent in a long and bloody war.

There would have been no dead American boys wasting in deep morasses or buried in the torrid sands.

There would have been no widows left desolate, no children crying for a father who would never come back, no mothers heartbroken here.

There would have been no American homes resting in the shadows. [Applause.]

But it is said that the Democratic party was equally responsible for all the results of the war with Spain. If this were true it might silence our complaint, though not the justice of our position now.

But it is not true. The war with Spain was to make men free, not to make men slaves.

When that war ended, our share in the enterprise was ended. As well might it be said that a person intends to go to the North Pole because he declares his purpose to go north.

Participation in a lawful act does not imply acquiescence in an unlawful act. A war to make Cuba a free republic did not mean a war to enslave the Philippine people.

To the first we contributed; to the last we protested.

From the time the treaty of Spain was negotiated by the Republicans the Democrats have opposed it. We have protested against all that followed and we protest now.

We denied the right to acquire territory over which the Constitution was not supreme. We deny it now. We desired to give the people living in the Eastern seas their independence; it is our desire now.

When it was proclaimed that the war with Spain was to shake from the throat of Cuba the mailed hand of despotism, and that "criminal aggression" was not to be thought of, we believed that statement. To accomplish our high purpose all sections of our country responded.

Troops came from the North, out of the West, and the South was ready with her brave sons who know but one flag, willing at all times to shed their blood to protect it.

All sections and all parties contributed to the grand result.

But when there were no more armies to fight, no more navies to sink, and a once proud but now humble foe was at our feet to sue for peace, the Republican party made the terms.

Free Cuba was the legitimate result of the war; the Philippine Islands is the unlawful spoil.

In freeing Cuba, a work in which all Americans were cocontributors, there has been written a luminous page in American history.

In those far-off islands another and a dark one has been added by the Republican party. One has been written with a "pencil of light," the other with the point of a bloody sword. One tells of hope realized and independence gained, the other of hope blighted and liberty dead.

On the Cuban page we have traced the record of American honor; one the Philippine page, the story of American shame.

On the one we read how the flag was hauled down and a new flag with a single star was flung to the breeze, which one day with a people's consent may yet glitter in the tiara of the Republic. [Loud applause.]

On the other we read how the flag still waves amid the desolation and ruin we have wrought.

As we gave liberty to the Cubans, so we should to the Philippine people.

There are some who say that we promised independence to Cuba and did not to the people of the Philippine Archipelago.

I dislike to think that the American Republic would quibble about the "nomination in the bond." The moral duty is the same.

We do not claim the credit of freeing Cuba on account of the bond, for this would rob us of the honor. We claim it because of the high level of a generous and moral act, and this is the pride we take.

If a national declaration of purpose was all that prevented the retention of Cuba and the want of it our justification for holding the Philippine Archipelago, we can not escape the imputation that the nation's virtue is only established by national declaration and not by national conscience.

The Filipinos had the same cause for war with Spain that the Cubans had. But they had accomplished much more. They had the same tyrannical master, and both had suffered. There were reconcentration camps in Cuba, where the people starved and died; there were dungeons in Manila, where the waters of the sea rose over the bodies and drowned the despairing wails of captive men.

Both yearned for liberty. Both looked to our Republic to bestow it.

One received it, and a people's prayers and blessings followed the flag as it came home from its mission of mercy. The other was denied it, and the flag there stands unhonored and unloved in the tears and blood of an unhappy and stricken people. Historical accuracy, as well as the importance of the great questions involved, make it necessary to state contemporaneous testimony relating to our early occupancy of the Philippine Islands. It will serve to contrast our position before we began a cruel and indefensible war with the present attitude of defending it. It will serve to mark the change in our estimates of the Filipinos and their leader after we had been compelled to find excuses and make justifications for the national wrong.

ALLIES.

In our occupancy of the islands and military operations, before and even after the fall of Manila, the Filipinos cooperated with us and they were our allies. When it was known that war had been declared with Spain, they looked forward with bright anticipation to the coming of the American fleet. The Spaniards to discourage them from attacks on their own forces, spread the report that the Americans were coming to enslave them, and to answer this the following manifesto was issued:

AMERICA'S ALLIES—THE MANIFESTO OF THE FILIPINOS.

The following is a translation from the Spanish of a proclamation of the rebel leaders in Hongkong, sent over to the Philippines in advance of the American squadron:

Compatriots: Divine Providence is about to place independence within our reach, and in a way the most free and independent nation could hardly wish for.

The Americans, not from mercenary motives, but for the sake of humanity and the lamentations of so many persecuted people, have considered it opportune to extend their protecting mantle to our beloved country, now that they have been obliged to sever relations with Spain, owing to the tyranny this nation is exercising in Cuba, causing enormous injury to the Americans, who have such large commercial and other interests there.

At the present moment an American squadron is preparing to sail for the Philippines.

We, your brothers, are very much afraid that you may be induced to fire on the Americans. No, brothers, never make this mistake. Rather blow your own brains out than fire a shot or treat as enemies those who are your liberators.

Your natural enemies, your executioners, the authors of your misery and unhappiness, are the Spaniards who govern you. Against these you must raise your weapons and odium; understand well, against the Spaniards and never against the Americans.

Take no notice of the decree of the Governor-General calling you to arms, although it may cost you your lives. Rather die than be ungrateful to our American liberators.

The governor-general calls you to arms. What for? To defend your Spanish tyrants? To defend those that have despised you, and even in public speeches asked for your extermination—those that have treated you little better than savages? No! No! A thousand times no!

Give a glance at history and you will see that all Spain's wars in Oceania have sacrificed Philippine blood. We have been put to fight in Cochin China to assist the French in an affair that in no way concerned the Philippines. We were compelled to spill our blood by Simon de Anda against the English, who in any case would have made better rulers than the Spaniards. Every year our children are taken away to be sacrificed in Mindanao and Sulu on the pretense of making us believe these people are our enemies, when in reality they are our brothers, like us, fighting for their independence.

After having sacrificed our blood against the English, against the Annamites, against the people of Mindanao, etc., what recompense or thanks have we received from the Spanish Government? Obscurity, poverty, the butchery of those dear to us. Enough, brothers, of this Spanish tutelage.

Take note, the Americans will attack by sea and prevent any reenforcements coming from Spain; therefore we insurgents must attack by land. Probably you will have more than sufficient arms, because the Americans have arms and will find means to assist us.

There, where you see the American flag flying, assemble in numbers; they are our redeemers.

Our unworthy names are as nothing, but one and all of us invoke the name of the greatest patriot our country has seen, in the sure and certain hope that his spirit will be with us in these moments and guide us to victory—our immortal José Rizal.

On June 8, 1898, wealthy Filipino patriots who had left Manila and sought refuge in Singapore thus addressed our consul-general, Mr. Pratt:

THE ADDRESS.

To the Hon. Edward Spencer Pratt, consul-general of the United States of North America, Singapore.

SIR: The Philippine colony resident in this port, composed of representatives of all social classes, have come to present their respects to you as the legitimate representative of the great and powerful American Republic, in order to express our eternal gratitude for the moral and material protection extended by Admiral Dewey to our trusted leader, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, who has been driven to take up arms in the name of 8,000,000 Filipinos, in defense of those very principles of justice and liberty of which your country is the foremost champion.

Our countrymen at home, and those of us residing here, refugees from Spanish misrule and tyranny in our beloved native land, hope that the United States, your nation, persevering in its humane policy will efficaciously second the programme arranged between you, sir, and General Aguinaldo in this port of Singapore, and secure to us our independence under the protection of the United States. Our warmest thanks are especially due to you, sir, personally, for having been the first to cultivate relations with General Aguinaldo, and arrange for the cooperation with Admiral Dewey, thus supporting our aspirations which time and subsequent actions have developed and caused to meet with the applause and approbation of your nation. Finally, we request you to convey to your illustrious President and the American people, and to Admiral Dewey, our sentiments of sincere gratitude and our most fervent wishes for their prosperity.

The address was presented by Dr. Santos, a man of learning and culture, and thoroughly in sympathy with the revolutionists.

It was replied to by our consul-general as follows:

THE UNITED STATES CONSUL-GENERAL REPLIES.

After listening to the address the United States consul-general, also speaking in French, said:

"Gentlemen, the honor you have conferred upon me is so unexpected that I can not find appropriate words with which to thank you and with which to reply to the eloquent address you have just read to me. Rest assured, though, that I fully understand and sincerely appreciate the motives that have prompted your present action and that your words, which have sunk deep in my heart, shall be faithfully repeated to the President, to Admiral Dewey, and to the American people—from whom I am sure that they will meet with full and generous response. A little over a month ago the world resounded with the praises of Admiral Dewey and his fellow-officers and men for a glorious victory won by the American Asiatic Squadron in the Bay of Manila.

"Now we have news of the brilliant achievements of your own distinguished leader, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, cooperating on land with the Americans at sea. You have just reason to be proud of what has been and is being accomplished by General Aguinaldo and your fellow-countrymen under his command. When, six weeks ago, I learned that General Aguinaldo had arrived incognito in Singapore, I immediately sought him out. An hour's interview convinced me that he was the man for the occasion; and, having communicated with Admiral Dewey, I accordingly arranged for him to join the latter, which he did, at Cavite. The rest you know.

"I am thankful to have been the means, though merely the accidental means, of bringing about the arrangement between General Aguinaldo and Admiral Dewey, which has resulted so happily. I can only hope that the eventful outcome will be all that can be desired for the happiness and welfare of the Filipinos. My parting words to General Aguinaldo were 'General, when you have proved yourself great, prove yourself magnanimous,' and from the treatment accorded to the recent Spanish prisoners it would appear that he had done so." [Applause.]

At the conclusion of Mr. Pratt's speech refreshments were served, and as the Filipinos, being Christians, drink alcohol, there was no difficulty in arranging as to refreshments. "Long life and prosperity" were drunk to Mr. Consul-General Spencer Pratt. Then the American Republic was cheered. Then Commodore Dewey was cheered for his gallant victory. Then England was cheered for sheltering the Filipino refugees.

PRESENTING A FLAG.

Then Dr. Santos, as the spokesman of the Filipino refugees, again addressed the audience with many complimentary remarks on the gallantry of Admiral Dewey and the skill and foresight of United States Consul-General Pratt, and with glowing forecasts of the prosperity that awaited the Philippine Islands under the new régime. He expressed a desire to have an American flag as a reminiscence of the day's proceedings. Mr. Spencer Pratt, again speaking in French, replied, saying:

"This flag was borne in battle, and is the emblem of that very liberty that you are seeking to attain. Its red stripes represent the blood that was shed for the cause; the white represents the purity of the motive; the blue field stands for the azure of the sky; the stars are the free and independent States of the Union. Take the flag and keep it as a souvenir of this occasion."

At the conclusion of Mr. Pratt's speech, he handed an American flag to Dr. Santos, who received it reverently, and waved it exultantly amidst the cheers of the assembled Filipinos. The flag would, said Dr. Santos, be preserved so that future generations might look at it with pride.

On April 24, 1898, a meeting took place between Admiral (then Commodore) Dewey and Aguinaldo, representing the insurgents. This was through the efforts of the American consul, Mr. Pratt.

The following is the telegram of Pratt to Dewey:

Aguinaldo, insurgent leader, here. Will come Hongkong arrange with Commodore for general cooperation insurgents Manila if desired. Telegraph.

PRATT.

Dewey's reply was:

Tell Aguinaldo come soon as possible.

DEWEY.

As a consequence of this meeting Aguinaldo returned to the attack on the Spanish forces with renewed vigor and with arms and ammunition furnished by Dewey.

When the terms of the treaty of peace were being discussed in Paris, the following excerpt from the answer of the United States Peace Commissioners to the demand of the Spanish commission that Spain should retain the Philippine Islands, is quoted:

Even if the United States were disposed to permit Spanish sovereignty to remain over the Philippines, and to leave to Spain the restoration of peace and order in the islands, could it now in honor do so? The Spanish commissioners have, themselves, in an earlier stage of these negotiations, spoken of the Filipinos as our allies. This is not a relation which the Government of the United States intended to establish; but it must at least be admitted that the insurgent chiefs returned and resumed their activity with the consent of our military and naval commanders, who permitted them to arm with weapons which we had captured from the Spaniards, and assured them of fair treatment and justice.

On October 14, 1898, at Paris, the following question was asked by Mr. FRYE, one of our commissioners, of Commander R. B.

Bradford, United States Navy, to which the following reply was made:

Mr. FRYE:

Q. I would like to ask just one question in that line. Suppose the United States in the progress of that war found the leader of the present Philippine rebellion an exile from his country in Hongkong and sent for him and brought him to the islands in an American ship, and then furnished him 4,000 or 5,000 stands of arms and allowed him to purchase as many more stands of arms in Hongkong, and accepted his aid in conquering Luzon, what kind of a nation, in the eyes of the world, we would appear to be to surrender Aguinaldo and his insurgents to Spain to be dealt with as they please?

A. We become responsible for everything he has done; he is our ally, and we are bound to protect him.

Before the Paris Commission, Mr. FRYE asked Gen. Charles A. Whittier, United States Army, a question, to which was made the reply following:

Q. Were they of material assistance to us?

A. Very great. If the protocol had not been signed I think the Spanish at home would have insisted upon their army doing something. They dismissed Augustin because he was not disposed to fight, and I think if they had not had this experience of having been driven back into the city and the water cut off, so even that Jaudenes said he could not remove his noncombatants, the Government would have insisted on his making a fight, and he could have made a very good one, for his position was strong, if they had any fight in them at all. But every place had been taken from them by the Filipinos, who managed their advances and occupation of the country in an able manner.

After the memorable interview with Dewey, Aguinaldo issued this proclamation:

PROCLAMATION OF GENERAL AGUINALDO, MAY 24, 1898.

FILIPINOS: The great nation, North America, cradle of true liberty and friendly on that account to the liberty of our people, oppressed and subjugated by the tyranny and despotism of those who have governed us, has come to manifest even here a protection which is decisive as well as disinterested toward us, considering us endowed with sufficient civilization to govern by ourselves this our unhappy land. To maintain this so lofty idea, which we deserve from the now very powerful nation, North America, it is our duty to detest all those acts which belie such an idea as pillage, robbery, and every class of injury to persons as well as to things. With a view to avoiding international conflicts during the period of our campaign I order as follows:

ARTICLE I. The lives and property of all foreigners, including Chinese and all Spaniards, who either directly or indirectly have joined in taking arms against us, are to be respected.

ART. II. The lives and property of those who lay down their arms are also to be respected.

ART. III. Also are to be respected all sanitary establishments and ambulances, and likewise the persons and things which may be found in either one or the other, including the assistants in this service, unless they show hostility.

ART. IV. Those who disobey what is prescribed in the preceding articles will be tried by summary court and put to death, if such disobedience shall cause assassination, fire, robbery, and violation.

Given at Cavite the 24th of May, 1898.

EMILIO AGUINALDO.

Any fair perusal of these evidences, which are contemporaneous and intrinsically true, coming from official sources, will be convincing not only of cooperation but of the national responsibility which we incurred. All the documents were forwarded to the Department at Washington when the situation was thoroughly understood.

Before the fall of Manila, Aguinaldo was in constant communication with the American officers and Consul-General Williams, and everything he did was approved.

AGUINALDO.

Success or failure has much to do with our estimates of men. When Aguinaldo was cooperating with our forces, I will quote from American officials as to his character and conduct.

The following was the impression of Consul-General Pratt, which was communicated to the Department of State:

Just previous to his departure, I had a second and last interview with General Aguinaldo, the particulars of which I shall give you by next mail.

The General impressed me as a man of intelligence, ability, and courage, and worthy of the confidence that had been placed in him.

I think that in arranging for his direct cooperation with the commander of our forces I have prevented possible conflict of action and facilitated the work of occupying and administering the Philippines.

If this course of mine meets with the Government's approval, as I trust it may, I shall be fully satisfied; to Mr. Bray, however, I consider there is due some special recognition for most valuable services rendered.

How that recognition can best be made I leave to you to decide.

I have, etc.,

E. SPENCER PRATT,

Consul-General Wildman sent this to the Department of State July 18, 1898:

Immediately on the arrival of Aguinaldo at Cavite he issued a proclamation, which I had outlined for him before he left, forbidding pillage, and making it a criminal offense to maltreat neutrals. He, of course, organized a government of which he was dictator, an absolutely necessary step if he hoped to maintain control over the natives, and from that date until the present time he has been uninterruptedly successful in the field and dignified and just as the head of his government. According to his own statements to me by letter, he has been approached by both the Spaniards and the Germans, and has had tempting offers made him by the Catholic Church. He has been watched very closely by Admiral Dewey, Consul Williams, and his own junta here in Hongkong, and nothing of moment has occurred which would lead anyone to believe that he was not carrying out to the letter the promises made to me in this consulate.

The insurgents are fighting for freedom from the Spanish rule, and rely upon the well-known sense of justice that controls all the actions of our Government as to their future.

In conclusion, I wish to put myself on record as stating that the insurgent government of the Philippine Islands can not be dealt with as though they were North American Indians, willing to be removed from one reservation to another at the whim of their masters. If the United States decides not to retain the Philippine Islands, its 10,000,000 people will demand independence, and the attempt of any foreign nation to obtain territory or coaling stations will be resisted with the same spirit with which they fought the Spaniards.

I have the honor, etc.,

ROUNSEVELLE WILDMAN,
Consul-General.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What time was that?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. July 18, 1898.

Consul-General Pratt also sent the following to the Department of State:

Considering the enthusiastic manner General Aguinaldo has been received by the natives and the confidence with which he already appears to have inspired Admiral Dewey, it will be admitted, I think, that I did not overrate his importance and that I have materially assisted the cause of the United States in the Philippines in securing his cooperation.

Why this cooperation should not have been secured to us during the months General Aguinaldo remained awaiting events in Hongkong, and that he was allowed to leave there without having been approached in the interests of our Government, I can not understand.

No close observer of what had transpired in the Philippines during the past four years could have failed to recognize that General Aguinaldo enjoyed above all others the confidence of the Filipino insurgents and the respect alike of Spaniards and foreigners in the islands, all of whom vouched for his high sense of justice and honor.

I have the honor to be, etc.,

E. SPENCER PRATT,

Maj. J. F. Bell thus reported on August 27, 1898, to General Merritt:

In an effort to catalogue and describe the principal leaders among Aguinaldo's following I have arrived at the following conclusions, which are believed to be practically correct:

Aguinaldo.—Honest, sincere, and poor, not well educated, but a natural leader of men, with considerable shrewdness and ability; has the power of creating among the people confidence in himself, and is undoubtedly a very popular man, highly respected by all; but there are many better educated and richer natives who do not think he has sufficient education or experience to be a suitable president. He was a "little governor" of a small town in one of the provinces. It is also said that he was a school-teacher, but I have been unable to verify this assertion.

Before the fall of Manila the official records which have been made public show that Aguinaldo gratefully received all instructions from our officers and did not disobey a single order.

Both he and the men under his command were deeply imbued with the idea that the United States Government was their friend and ally and would either annex the islands as a part of the territory of the United States and make their people citizens, which was their first desire, or leave them an independent national life to begin the experiment of self-government under the guiding hand and benificent influence of the Republic.

That they had the right to expect either one or the other, both from the conduct and words of American officials, as well as our avowed purpose toward Cuba, it is believed no just man will deny.

The evidences are overwhelming in their force.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman, but I hope the gentleman will make the question short.

Mr. OLMSTED. If I understood the gentleman, he was demonstrating that the Filipinos were kinder than the American soldiers?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is mistaken in his assumption as to what I was talking about. I am only talking about the Filipino. I will come to the American soldier later.

Mr. OLMSTED. I listened, and when the gentleman spoke of soldiers under the command of the Commander in Chief of the United States Army, I supposed they were our soldiers. I simply want to ask if he had heard of these genial Filipinos leaving General Luna with 32 shots and 40 bolo cuts dead at Aguinaldo's house.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Yes; I remember how in Samar you made a howling wilderness by your Republican policy and killed everything in sight over 10 years of age.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Make it short.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that General Luna provoked that fight. That is the accurate fact; it is the recorded fact; it is official.

Mr. OLMSTED rose.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I decline to yield any further. I do not want to appear as discourteous to the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is all right.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I think you mistook entirely what I was saying. I was and have been talking about the Filipinos, and not anybody under the command of American officers.

FILIPINOS NOT SAVAGES.

They have been so denominated by the President of the United States and others as an answer to our criticisms of the conduct of the war.

If it were true, it might modify our opinion of the situation, but the testimony of United States officials, as well as contemporaneous history, entirely disproves the charge. Governor Taft speaks of them as a docile, bright, and ambitious race, though he thinks that at present they are not fitted for self-government. I pause here to bear willing testimony to the ability, purity of purpose, and patriotism of Governor Taft and the present acting governor, Gen. Luke E. Wright. I believe if they had been on the ground from the beginning, much useless sacrifice would have been saved and that they and their confréres have accomplished more than our armies. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You are right about that.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. The consensus of opinion among those who have had the best opportunities for observation is that the Filipinos are an imitative race, of considerable skill in various branches, docile, and easily influenced by kind treatment.

They have had among their number physicians of skill, lawyers of learning, and many men of high character and ability.

United States Consul Wildman, at Hongkong, in a communication to the Department of State, July 18, 1898, thus writes:

Mr. Wildman to Mr. Moore.

No. 63.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Hongkong, July 18, 1898.

SIR: I am taking the liberty of calling your attention to the continuous repetition of telegraphic information reaching this port that it is the policy of the United States Government to allow the Philippine Islands to return to Spain on the conclusion of the war.

Without placing any reliance in these statements, I desire to use them as a text upon which to respectfully submit the result of my experience with the leaders of the present Philippine insurgents, and to suggest the utter impossibilty of Spain, even with the aid of the United States, ever regaining a foothold on these islands.

I have lived among the Malays of the Straits Settlements and have been an honored guest of the different sultanates. I have watched their system of government and have admired their intelligence, and I rank them high among the semicivilized nations of the earth. The natives of the Philippine Isands belong to the Malay race, and while there are very few pure Malays among their leaders, I think their stock has rather been improved than debased by admixture.

I consider the 40 or 50 Philippine leaders, with whose fortunes I have been very closely connected, both the superiors of the Malays and the Cubans. Aguinaldo, Agoncilla, and Sandico are all men who would all be leaders in their separate departments in any country, while among the wealthy Manila men, who live in Hongkong and who are spending their money liberally for the overthrow of the Spaniards and the annexation to the United States, men like the Cortes family and the Basa family, would hold their own among bankers and lawyers anywhere.

Admiral Dewey on August 29, 1898, at Manila thus wrote the Secretary of the Navy:

In a telegram sent to the Department on June 23 I expressed the opinion that "these people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races." Further intercourse with them has confirmed me in this opinion.

Consul-General Williams at Manila, on the 16th of June, 1898, communicated this to the Department of State:

While the Spaniards cruelly and barbarously slaughter Filipinos taken in arms, and often noncombatants, women, and children, the insurgent victors, following American example, spare life, protect the helpless, and nurse, feed, and care for Spaniards taken prisoners and for Spanish wounded as kindly as they care for the wounded fallen from their own ranks.

Gen. Charles A. Whittier testified as follows before the United States Peace Commissioners at Paris;

Their conduct to their Spanish prisoners has been deserving of the praise of all the world. With hatred of priests and Spaniards, fairly held on account of the conditions before narrated, and with every justification to a savage mind for the most brutal revenge, I have heard of no instance of torture, murder, or brutality since we have been in the country.

All the testimony which I have quoted is official. It comes from American officers. The people of the country have a right to rely upon it as true. If it will serve to direct public attention from indiscriminate abuse of a people whose liberties we have encompassed and present to the forum of the American conscience a clear understanding of the facts as they have existed, my purpose will be accomplished.

The people are entitled to know the situation before they indorse the policy of a party which has brought the Republic perilously near the "Serbonian bog" of imperialistic empire, which the best thought of the nation, irrespective of partisanship, deplores, and from which the fathers of the Republic have warned with words of prophetic wisdom.

BEGINNING OF HOSTILITIES.

The protocol between Spain and the United States was signed on August 12 and Manila fell on August 14—two days following.

By the terms of the protocol the American forces held the city and the bay and harbor of Manila. This was provisional and subject to future conditions to be determined by the proposed treaty of peace.

This treaty of peace, by which we acquired the Philippine Islands, was ratified on February 6, and on February 4 hostilities began between the American forces and the revolutionists under Aguinaldo.

The exchange of ratifications between the two countries did not take place until the following summer.

Senator SPOONER, who ranks high as a constitutional lawyer, has admitted in the Senate that no title was acquired until the exchange of ratifications had been consummated, and that the sovereignty we thus acquired did not relate back to the treaty itself.

So when hostilities began we had no title to the islands and no provisional right except to the city and harbor of Manila.

Aguinaldo had been refused admission into Manila for the reason, as explained afterwards, that the American officers feared his forces would burn and pillage Manila. They had never burned or pillaged before. Disappointed, but still believing in the sense of justice of our Government, he complained, but peacefully acquiesced. He was then ordered from one position to another. He never disobeyed an order. It is said he contemplated an attack on the American forces; this he denied. It is certain he never made an attack. Before the vision of the Republican party the dream of empire had risen, and the change was rapid. Our allies had become our enemies.

An inoffensive people who had trusted us became savages.

Dewey's guns, as they swept the Spanish navy from the sea, had found an echo in every patriot heart. When the next American arm was discharged, it brought misery, despair, and death, and wrung the cry of bitter agony from a hapless people. The hand that had been kissed in patriotic fervor smote with fearful impact.

Aguinaldo's forces had been gradually ordered back, and a "dead line" had been established some distance out from Manila by the American officers, beyond which the insurgents were ordered not to come.

It was for a disobedience of this order, when two Filipinos crossed the line, that the first shots were fired by an American soldier who killed one or both of the men.

Intermittent firing occurred that night on both sides, but during the whole time until the next day not one American soldier was killed, not one wounded. The next day the Americans advanced, and this was the only organized stand the insurrectionists ever made. The havoc was awful. Three thousand Filipinos were slain and only 250 American soldiers were killed and wounded. After that there was no longer war. The Filipinos scattered like a frightened covey when fired into by the hunter, and separated into small and detached bands. They were hunted and killed wherever found. They were often guilty of cruelty, and our reprisals were swift and terrible.

CONDUCT OF HOSTILITIES.

The sacrifices which the Republican party has demanded of the American Army have followed all wars of exploitation and unlawful conquest of a people. History has but repeated itself in the Philippine Islands. For empire it was willing to subject the American soldiers to the terrors of the bolo in the hands of a lurking foe. It was willing to see him resort to torture in reprisal.

The Army was ordered to the Philippine Islands. What occurred is a part of my disgrace, just as its imperishable glory, won on many a battlefield, is a part of my heritage.

There have passed into history two events of striking contrast. The Oregon had made her wonderful run around the world and was in the memorable engagement which strewed the sea with the wrecks of the flower of the Spanish navy. While the Spanish seamen were struggling in the water, our men raised a shout of human triumph, but gallant Captain Philip raised his voice and cried: "Don't cheer; the poor devils are dying." This was at Santiago, when we were fighting for human liberty.

General Smith, commanding the American forces in Samar, gave an order to kill all children over 10 years of age and to make the province a howling wilderness. This was in the Philippine Islands when we were fighting against human liberty.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would ask the gentleman whether he would condemn the Confederate army for the Fort Pillow massacre or the Quantrell outrages in Missouri?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Well, my friend, are you going to wave a bloody shirt here now?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; but when a gentleman takes a single instance like that and puts it up against the American Army, it is equal to the Fort Pillow massacre.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I say that no Confederate officer in this world ever gave such an order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And there was no such massacre at Fort Pillow.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman not to interject irrelevant questions into my speech, and I will be glad indeed, if you have nothing more relevant to say, if you do not interrupt me further.

The answer to the charge against the Republican party for the train of evils which followed its quest of empire did not come from Arlington, once the home of Robert E. Lee, whose sword was stainless, when the President of the United States put in an unworthy plea against the South. It was a desecration of the place and the time. If the silence of the grave could have been lifted, there would have been a protest from the old soldiers of the Union, calmly sleeping beneath the shade of the trees on the old estate of the knightly Southerner.

No fair-minded American of any section will accept the excuse for atrocities in the Philippines that lynchings have occurred in the South. They have also occurred in the North. They have been more frequent in the South, for the cause has been of more frequent occurrence, and for no other reason. They are to be deplored wherever they occur. One murder can never justify another, nor can just and lawful criticism of the Republican party be silenced by shallow appeals of sectionalism. No man willing to admit the truth will be deceived with the effort to divert the subject for partisan purposes.

It is another phase of imperialism affecting us at home, as it will affect us more and more in the future, when the right of free speech in a free country is sought to be abridged, when a military President resents with ill-concealed petulance the right of American representatives to criticise the results of a cruel policy which would exterminate a people.

I am an American first, and for my country right or wrong, but as an American representative I claim the privilege of insisting it shall be right.

> Though every leaf were a tongue to cry "Thou must,"
> He will not say the unjust thing is just.

CAPACITY OF FILIPINOS FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT—OUGHT THEY TO GOVERN THEMSELVES?

Admiral Dewey has reported as the result of his observation of the people that they are better fitted for self-government than the Cubans. So have many others.

Capacity for self-government and capacity for good or the best government should not be confused. Before this war of conquest began I do not think any party, or, indeed, any American, denied the proposition that any people were fitted for self-government according to their standards. I believe the United States can give the Filipino people a better government according to our standards. That we can give them one better suited to their climatic conditions and environment may well be doubted. That we have the right by conquest to impose upon them one which they do not want is to be denied and regretted by every lover of liberty.

The old American idea was that self-government is the best government.

The Filipinos are better fitted to govern themselves than many of the South American republics were when they began independent national lives—as well fitted as Mexico was when she established a republic.

The Filipinos and the Japanese are of the same stock. The points of similarity are very marked. Japan, a still pagan country, has made in recent years rapid and wonderful strides in the arts of civilization.

This has been accomplished by them as an independent people, without foreign intervention or control of any sort.

Capacity for government can never be demonstrated until the experiment is tried. Kings have always denied it to hold subjects; the Republican party denies it to retain the Philippine Islands.

The historian Macaulay wrote:

> Many politicians of our time are in the habit of laying it down as a self-evident proposition that no people ought to be free until they are fit to use their freedom. The maxim is worthy of the fool in the old story, who resolved not to go into the water until he had learned to swim. If men are to wait for liberty till they become wise and good in slavery, they may indeed wait forever.

REPUBLICAN JUSTIFICATION.

The justification which the Republican party interposes for its great national blunder is that we have a mission to perform and that honor and duty alike forbid us to recede.

This has been the refuge of every bloody conquest in the name of national honor. It was the excuse of the powers when they partitioned Poland. It was Bonaparte's plea when he shed rivers of blood and when the orphan's cry rose and followed him to bleak Helena. It was the justification of the supporters of the Crown for tyranny toward the American colonies. It was Spain's defense to her misrule and cruelties in Cuba. It is the plea of the Republican party in its lust for empire.

It is said that if we gave the Philippine people their independence, we would be the laughingstock of the world.

It is absurd.

We should have no ambition to become one of the family of colony-holding nations. The theory of our Government is forever opposed to the idea.

I believe if the Republican party had the virtue to resist the temptation of empire and the promise of spoil, it would add immeasurably to our reputation abroad and our honor at home.

Our occupancy of the Philippine Islands is one of might, not right. I do not believe in the doctrine, "They shall take who have the power, and they shall keep who can." We had the power to hold Cuba, but did not.

WHAT WILL WE GAIN?

But after we have blighted the hopes of a people and taken by force their country, what have we gained?

The sullen submission of a people who trusted us, a people who can never become American citizens; a land of torrid heat, where no American will go except in the spirit of adventure, where American homes will never be erected, where American ideas will never prevail.

We have incorporated a million and a half of Mohammedan Moors, practicing the most cruel form of human slavery. Our gain in trade is nothing compared to the cost of a war which will be necessary to eradicate slavery under the American flag.

We will be required to maintain a large standing army to hold an unwilling people and silence its protests.

We begin empire building 8,000 miles from home and are inevitably drawn into all future conflicts in the East. We will have an unprotected frontier which will tax the public purse to fortify and defend. We have by force entered into a national miscegenation. It will not improve the inferior people; it will weaken and lower us.

Mr. Chairman, the future of the Philippine Islands rests with the Congress of the United States.

The eminent lawyer and ex-President, Benjamin Harrison, in speaking of our territorial acquisitions, said:

> A man whose protection from wrong rests wholly upon the benevolence of another or of a Congress is a slave—a man without rights.

In the name of national duty we are summoned to commit a national crime. We are about to make subjects a people whose aspirations for liberty we quenched forever. We will give them no laws we do not make for them, and give them no rights except at our pleasure. They are to be left floating hither and thither upon the vexed and uncertain sea of politics, subject ever to the caprice of parties and without constitutional chart or compass.

We leave the Filipino without a country. He is not of us and has no land of his own. We have taken from him the right ever to be free.

To do this we have weakened the moral forces of the Republic and begot indifference, if not contempt, for the Constitution and its sacred obligations. Do what you will, say what we will, when we weaken the Constitution we weaken American liberty; when we destroy it, American liberty is gone.

TWO IDEAS OF OUR DESTINY.

There are two ideas of the destiny of the Republic.

One has all the glamour of the "cloth of gold," of infinite change and fascination.

In its imperial sweep it comprehends a vast scope of empire, new theories of government, and new rights of man.

The vision which arises is alluring and fills the imagination with the splendors of martial glory and the rich spoils of conquest.

But there is another destiny, wrought out of constant purpose and the old notions of human rights and republican self-restraint.

It recalls our early struggles for liberty and the old Continentals who faltered not.

It believes that "we are, and of right ought to be, free and independent," and would not deny that right to any other people under the canopy of the sky.

It would still guide the Republic in the path which our patriots blazed in the New World for the feet of liberty-loving men to tread the ways of everlasting glory.

It looks upon our mighty achievement and beholds the sublime results of human freedom.

It turns its back upon the empire and points to Bunker Hill.

It listens to the voice of no strange god, but worships in the temple of the fathers and at the shrine where they knelt in humble reverence.

To destroy human freedom is not our destiny.

To perpetuate it at home, to be its friend in all the world, is the high mission and true destiny of the American Republic. [Long-continued applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2295, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3110, to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, with Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3110, for the purpose of putting the same into conference.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate amendment may be nonconcurred in and the request of the Senate for a conference be acceded to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate be disagreed to and that the conference asked for by the Senate be agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I trust that no one who favors the Spooner amendment will object to this request. I should object to it myself but for the fact that I regard this as a pro forma proceeding affording the speediest way of bringing the question before the House. I have personal assurance from the gentleman from Iowa that every proper effort will be made to bring back a conference report at an early date, and when that conference report comes those who desire to make or support a motion to concur in the Senate substitute will have an opportunity to do so, if the conferees do not agree. I so understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I trust that no objection will be made by those who favor the Nicaragua route, and I hope the conferees of the House will fight to the last ditch to bring the Nicaragua proposition back into the House and to defeat the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session (Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair).

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the Almighty Father, the Giver of all that is good and beautiful on this mundane sphere, that He has endowed me with an optimistic disposition. I thank Him day by day that He has not afflicted me with a soul that goes everlastingly and eternally snooping around to discover that which is bad and vile, dishonest and dishonorable, debased and vicious in mankind generally and my friends, neighbors, and countrymen in particular. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I confess frankly that I am an optimist. I love to look upon the bright side of life. I love to believe that my fellow-men are sincere and honest; that women are pure and virtuous; that this old world of ours is one of sunshine, and laughter, and joy, and happiness. I would "rather be in trust o'erconfident a thousand times deceived than wrongly once wound with ungenerous doubt the breast of Truth." But, above all else, I have an abiding faith in the ability, the honesty, the integrity, the loyalty, and the patriotism of my fellow-citizens. [Applause.] I firmly believe that no condition will ever arise in our country's history that will baffle the skill and the ability of American statesmanship.

Great and grave problems have heretofore frequently presented themselves during the one hundred and twenty-six years of our national life, and simultaneously with the problems have arisen the men to solve them. Our annals are so replete with the names of our country's illustrious sons, who, when the emergency arose, grappled with the conditions that have presented themselves boldly, honestly, fearlessly, faithfully, aye, and successfully, that it would be invidious for me to particularize. We have a right to be proud of our past, and, judging by that past, we are justified in having unbounded faith in the future of the Republic and the honor of her citizens.

But there has never been a crisis in the affairs of this nation that did not bring with it an army of objectors and malcontents, whose croakings and dire forebodings of coming evil and national disruption, up to the present time at least, have happily never been realized, and my optimistic and prophetic soul tells me that such vaporings never will be realized, but that our country shall endure among the nations of the earth and shall continue the beacon light of liberty, even to the last syllable of recorded time.

Why, sir, there are some men so peculiarly constituted that they are ready to predict failure for any progressive movement, be it in science, art, literature, or government. The word "success" has no place in their vocabulary. It is such men as these who, when Fulton announced to an interested world that he had perfected a steamship and would give an exhibition on the Hudson River to demonstrate the success of his invention, shook their heads doubtfully and solemnly said that it was all simply a waste of time; that the machine would not work. But we all know that it did work, and to-day the steamship is rapidly driving the sailing vessel off the seas; it has revolutionized the ocean carrying trade; it has facilitated the expansion of our foreign commerce; it has brought the uttermost nations of the earth into a closer relationship, and it has enabled civilization to spread its luminous rays even to the darkest quarters of the universe.

Again, when Samuel F. B. Morse came to Congress and asked for a small appropriation for the construction of a telegraph line between the cities of Washington and Baltimore, in order that he might prove the great worth of his marvelous invention, there were in those days learned members—aye, honest and most worthy members, if you please—who bitterly opposed the measure, because they believed it to be a waste of public money and that the machine would not work. But it did work, and to-day, with submarine cables and a network of wires, overhead and underground, extending north, east, south, and west, the electric spark literally puts "a girdle around the earth in thirty minutes." The electric telegraph is in our age and time as necessary to our daily existence as is the very air we breathe or the water we drink.

And, sir, I verily believe that if some of these pessimists had been present in the Garden of Eden when the Almighty took a rib out of Adam and created Eve they would have shaken their heads dolefully and would have sorrowfully exclaimed, "It's no use; she won't work." [Great laughter and applause,]

And so, Mr. Chairman, with hundreds of historic instances before me to convince me of the existence of that characteristic which Edgar Allen Poe has so graphically described as "The Imp of the Perverse," I feel satisfied that no matter how humane, no matter how patriotic, no matter how honorable a measure to promote the welfare of the people of the Philippines might be, it was reasonable to expect that it would be characterized by some of our political opponents as "vicious in principle," "bad in its details," "unjust," "inexpedient," "indefensible." But, sir, the minority membership of the Committee on Insular Affairs has at least had the courage to admit "that three centuries of Spanish dominion have destroyed all self-government in the Philippine Islands, and that its people at this time are unprepared for its exercise;" and I for one desire to congratulate and felicitate them in having thus boldly, honestly, and frankly stated the conditions that every fair-minded man must admit actually exist in that distant archipelago.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman read the concluding sentence?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman can read it in his own time, or some gentleman on your side can. It is part of the record.

It was my pleasure to have visited the Philippine Islands last summer. I spent five weeks there. I met and conversed with hundreds of natives of those islands, including Aguinaldo, Paterno, Arellano, Torres, Mapa, Tavera, Yanko, Dr. Albert, Cailles, Calderon, Buencamino, Herrera, Fabie, Rosalio, and men of like standing and character, as well as many of the common people, and I can honestly say that never once during my entire sojourn among them did a single Filipino tell me that he or his people asked for or even wanted independence.

On the contrary, most of their leaders repeatedly admitted to me that they were incapable of self-government, and that they were more than content to be under the American flag. Indeed, Señor Fabie, who is an excellent English scholar and speaks our language very fluently—who is one of the leading men in Manila—said to me that he ventured the prediction that in twenty-five years from now, when his people shall have fully learned to know and understand the Americans as he understands them, when they shall have become acquainted with our history as he is, when they shall have learned to know our system of government as he does, there would not be a single Filipino who would not be as ready to lay down his life for the American flag as any native of the United States. [Applause.] And that sentiment, Mr. Chairman, was echoed by every one of the 20 Filipinos present at the interview. But while I am on this subject of my visit to the Philippines I think it fit and proper at this time to place before the House some of my personal experiences while in those distant islands.

It has frequently been asserted in public prints and from the rostrum that Admiral Dewey and Consul-General Wildman had made some definite promises to Aguinaldo respecting the independence of the Philippines, and that subsequently these promises had been repudiated. I had an extended interview with the former president of the alleged Philippine republic, at which were present Chaplain McKinnon, of the United States Army, and three ladies, one of whom acted as interpreter, besides myself. I told him frankly that it had been frequently asserted in the United States that pledges that had been made to him by Admiral Dewey and Mr. Wildman had been broken; that the American people believed in fairness and honest dealing, and that if such promises as had been made to him had been violated, he owed it to himself, his countrymen, and to history to state what these promises were.

I assured him that, so far as I was concerned, I would most certainly report them to my countrymen. He then admitted that he had had no promises whatever. [Applause on the Republican side.] Subsequently General Funston and Lieutenants Mitchell and Hazard, of the United States Army, told me that Aguinaldo had made similar statements to them—that he had had no agreements with either Admiral Dewey or Mr. Wildman; and quite recently Buencamino, the former secretary of state of the Philippine republic, informed me that at Tarlac, island of Luzon, Aguinaldo admitted to the insurgent leaders that neither Dewey nor Wildman had made him any promises. Buencamino stated to me that after this admission Aguinaldo's prestige waned materially. But I have here, and I desire to read at this time, a letter from Aguinaldo to Consul-General Wildman, which, to my mind at least, ought to set the matter at rest once and for all.

BACOOR, CAVITE, August 7, 1898.

Mr. ROUNSEVELLE WILDMAN,
Consul-General of the United States of America in Hongkong.

MY DEAR CONSUL: I thank you sincerely for your kind letter of the 25th of July last. I am forced to write you in confidence, in order to avoid the rupture of friendly relations which should exist between the United States and the Filipinos, convinced, as I am, that said rupture would be to the last degree prejudicial to both.

I understand that the Filipinos would gain much with the support and aid of the United States of America, and at the same time the power and riches of the latter would be considerably augmented by a close union with the former; but you, with your ability and your great experience, will understand the necessity for clearing up and defining those relations by means of a formal convention.

It is true that the North American forces have made protestations of friendship and concord to the people, but the officials act as though those protestations did not exist, performing acts of government and coercion in the name of their leaders. The people see those acts with extreme disgust and ask for the convention which is to serve as a guide of conduct, and I am not able to say that it does not exist, fearing that I will not be able to restrain the popular excitement.

For this reason I trust to your kindness to me and ask that you bring to bear on your Government all your strength and influence, so that it will understand that it is not at all right to decide upon the fate and future of the Filipino people without considering their wishes, duly represented by my government.

I am, most sincerely, [1]Signed by Aguinaldo, as per margin.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that is a copy of a copy-book letter or a copy of the original?

Mr. KAHN. It is a copy of the letter found in the "letters-sent" book.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A letter-press book?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; the "letters-sent" press book.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. What became of the original letter? Has Mr. Wildman ever stated that he received any such letter?

Mr. KAHN. If you will remember, Mr. Wildman was on his way to the United States and had a great deal of important information, documents, and so on, and on the 22d of February, 1901, the ship upon which he was, the Rio de Janeiro, struck a rock in the Golden Gate, outside of San Francisco, and went to the bottom.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that. My question was whether Mr. Wildman, who lived two years after that letter seems to have been written—and I do not mean to insinuate that it was not—ever acknowledged the receipt of it?

Mr. KAHN. I really do not know whether he made any acknowledgment of the receipt of it or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. The letter was written in August, 1898?

Mr. KAHN. Written August 7, 1898, and Aguinaldo says: "I write to you in confidence."

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman can state whether any such letter as that was ever found amongst the papers.

Mr. KAHN. I do not know. The letter was furnished me by Captain Taylor of the Army.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the gentleman to say that the statement of Captain Taylor was that that letter book was on file in Manila now.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; it is there now.

Mark this language, Mr. Chairman: "The people see these acts with extreme disgust, and ask for the convention which is to serve for a guide of conduct, and I am unable to say that it does not exist, fearing that I will not be able to restrain the popular excitement." Here is a tacit admission that the people had been stirred up by this wily chief under the belief that he had a promise of some kind or another, presumably that the people were to be given independence, and that he did not have the moral courage to tell them that he had lied. That is the plain nglish of it.

Mr. Chairman, during the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress a distinguished member of the House informed me that while Sixto Lopez, an agent of the insurgent government in the Philippines, was in Washington the latter had admitted to him that when the leaders of the insurrection against Spain had signed the treaty of Biacnabato they did so with a mental reservation, and that they did not consider the treaty as binding upon them in any way, shape, or manner. And so I asked Aguinaldo during the course of my interview, he having been one of the signers of that instrument, whether he, too, had affixed his signature with the mental reservation that if the time should be again opportune he would renew the struggle, but he unequivocally said "No; I signed in good faith." "You gave up all idea of a Philippine republic after having signed that treaty?" I asked. "Yes," he replied. "Then," said I, "when you took up arms against the Americans and again proclaimed a Philippine republic, was it because you feared the Americans would treat your countrymen more tyrannically than the Spaniards had done?" "I did not fear it, but my countrymen did, and I am always ready to respond to the call of my countrymen."

Mr. Chairman, I venture the assertion that the great majority of his countrymen did not know a blessed thing about America or Americans. Indeed, a most estimable lady, formerly of California, one of the first American teachers to enter the service of the public schools of Manila, told me that when she took charge of her classes she asked her pupils the question, "How many continents are there?" and the reply was, "Three; Europe, Asia, and Africa." And this, mark you, was not the answer of one pupil, but of the entire class, for under the system of education that prevailed there under the Spanish régime the classes always responded in unison. There was no such thing as an individual recitation.

Further investigation by this lady developed the fact that the existence of North and South America, their peoples, political divisions, and forms of government were practically as unknown to her pupils as was the very existence of America unknown to the civilized world on that memorable day of August, 1492, when Columbus with his caravels sailed from the port of Palos, Spain, out upon the unknown seas. So that, Mr. Chairman, if the people of the Philippines were afraid that the Americans would tyrannize over them it was not because of any knowledge that they had upon the subject, but because of the judicious and systematic lying that had been indulged in by these interested Filipino patriots—God save the mark!—in their efforts to instill a spirit of hatred and dread and vengeance into the minds and hearts of an otherwise friendly and confiding people.

I desire to say, further, in this connection that while I was at Iloilo, on the island of Panay, I had the honor of meeting over a hundred of the leading natives, including the provincial secretary, the presidente and town councilors, and the clerk and district attorney of the court of first instance, at a public reception there. As the House is doubtless aware, the inhabitants of Iloilo are, for the most part, Visayans. But prior to the breaking out of hostilities between the Filipinos and the Americans a number of Tagalog leaders had visited the island of Panay to stir up the fires of insurrection and revolt among the peaceful natives of that island. At this reception many of these Visayans informed me that the Americans had been most grossly misrepresented to them; that they had been told that we were infinitely worse than the Spaniards, but they were now convinced that we had been infamously lied about and most cruelly maligned. Since civil government had been inaugurated in their province they had become absolutely assured of the desire of the Americans to treat the Filipinos honestly and fairly, and they were now proud to be under our flag. Indeed, sir, some of them did not hesitate to say that they would much rather have American officials over them than their own countrymen.

And while I am upon this subject, Mr. Chairman, I desire to cite another instance that came under my personal observation where the veil of deceit, intimidation, and lies had been lifted from the eyes of the native population, which had been deceived as to the true character and purpose of the American people. While in Santa Cruz, in the province of Laguna, on the 19th of July, 1901, I met Lieut. Col. Julio Infante, who had been one of the commanders of the forces under General Cailles, one of the leaders of the insurrection. Infante also told me that the Americans had been lied about; but when his chief and the latter's followers found out that Americans were not the monsters they had been painted, and that the Civil Commission was passing the exceedingly liberal laws which are now in force in many parts of the archipelago, they concluded that the purposes of the Americans were honorable and humane, and they unconditionally surrendered and have been loyally supporting the American administration ever since. General Cailles himself subsequently went among the insurgent chiefs and induced some of them likewise to lay down their arms.

Why, sir, when this whole wretched business shall have been

[1]Translated under direction Capt. J. R. M. Taylor, Fourteenth Infantry.
There is no doubt as to the authenticity of this letter. It is translated from the Spanish copy of the original in the letter-sent book of the secretary of state of the so-called insurgent government, captured in 1899, in November, I think, by the United States forces in pursuit of Aguinaldo after he left Tarlac. The book is authenticated in many places by the signature of Mabini, and covers the period June 28, 1898, to September 6, 1899. The book was in my possession in Manila, and I found it myself in a mass of other papers and am absolutely convinced of its authenticity. It is on file in Manila.

JOHN R. M. TAYLOR,

fully investigated, when the light of truth shall have penetrated into our every transaction, when all the facts shall have become known to the people of the United States, they will shudder to think that such duplicity and deceit could have been practiced upon the ignorant masses of the Philippines by men who professed to be patriotic defenders of their fatherland, and whom some of our anti-imperialistic friends have been trying to canonize as heroes and martyrs.

Mr. Chairman, it was also my good fortune to meet, among others, during my stay in Manila, Señor Felipe Calderon, the author of the Malolos constitution. I consider him one of their ablest men. He certainly can not be accused of favoring the cause of the Americans because he has been honored with a civil appointment, for he told me that he had refused and would continue to refuse any position that might be offered him, in order that he could act independently and not have his motives questioned. I asked him frankly whether his people were able to govern themselves, and, without a moment's hesitation, he replied, "No; they are nothing but children." And yet there are men in our own country who have probably never seen a native Filipino in their lives who tell us in all seriousness that we ought to withdraw from the islands—we ought to "scuttle"—and leave these people to work out their own salvation.

Sir, to my mind, after having seen these people, after having conversed with many of their leaders, the proposition is infamous! They do not ask for, nor do they want independence. Governor Taft in his testimony before the Senate committee said that he believed that Señor Pedro A. Paterno was one of the few natives who believed in a Philippine republic. If that be the case, then Señor Paterno has recently changed his mind, for he told me in his own home on August 17, 1901, in the presence of some twenty others, that his countrymen did not desire independence. "But they want home rule," he said. "What do you mean by that?" I inquired. "Do you mean that you desire a form of government similar to our State governments?" "Yes, that is exactly what we want," said he. "That would necessitate the adoption of a State constitution," I rejoined, "and I want you to tell me frankly whether a constitution that would be suitable to the condition of the inhabitants of the island of Luzon would meet the requirements of the situation in Panay or Mindanao?" He promptly replied, "No."

And anybody who knows anything about that country knows that it would not. Paterno admitted that he had not looked at the matter from that standpoint, and his statement in this regard fully bears out the testimony of Generals Otis, Hughes, and MacArthur, who were on the ground at a very early period of our occupancy, who had frequent interviews with all their leaders, and who testified that one of the difficulties encountered in dealing with the Filipinos was the absolute uncertainty among the latter as to what they really did want. Their views were visionary. They did not seem to know what they wanted.

Mr. DINSMORE. Will my friend from California permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes: if it is a question.

Mr. DINSMORE. If the Filipinos did not desire independence, and if you insist that they made war on our forces, will you kindly tell us what was their motive in making war upon us?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, that was long before they knew the Americans as they do to-day, and when this very mendacious system of lying was being carried on in the islands. [Applause on the Republican side.] But since they have learned to know us better—since they know that we are there for their welfare and their good, they say, as I stated at the very beginning of my address, that they do not want independence, but that they are content to be under the American flag.

Mr. DINSMORE. Then, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield further.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow one interruption there?

Mr. KAHN. I do not want to be discourteous.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. We will extend your time.

Mr. KAHN. If I have time remaining when I have finished my address, I shall be very glad to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. KAHN. But day after day the natives of the Philippines are beginning to know us better; day after day they realize that we are there for their welfare and advancement. I had a goodly number of personal experiences where the natives volunteered the information that the Americans were "mucho buenos" (very good). I remember, among other pleasurable incidents of my trip, visiting the little town of Pagsanjan, in Laguna Province, which had been one of the hotbeds of the insurrection. I had been informed that the women had been even more vehement for independence than the men. On that memorable 4th of July, 1901, when General Cailles marched through the town toward Santa Cruz, where the surrender was to take place, the women and children strewed the path of the insurrecto patriots with flowers, the while tears of sympathy and regret at the failure of the cause streamed down their cheeks.

Two weeks later, on the 19th of July, I entered the town with my little party of American friends, unaccompanied by a single soldier, and the same children greeted us with cheers and a hearty "Hallo!" spoken in our own language, the same women stood at their windows, and with smiling faces waved their handkerchiefs to us in friendly greeting, and one would never have realized that there had ever been any other sentiment than friendship and peace between Americans and Filipinos in that recently pacified little community. [Applause.] Such were my experiences in the Philippines.

And so I have been rather astonished at the statements made from time to time by my friends on the other side of the Chamber, who likewise had visited the islands last summer. They seemed to find little or nothing to commend in the islands, the native inhabitants, or the American soldiers and civilians who were there in the service of their country, and I understand from their remarks that they favor the abandonment of our policy and the withdrawal of our forces as speedily as possible. Sir, in that connection I am reminded of a little story that Max O'Rell, the brilliant French wit and satirist, told in the course of his lecture on "Jonathan and his Continent." In his inimitable way he stated that he had occasion to visit Milwaukee some years ago and soon after his arrival there he was invited to listen to an address by a Mr. Johnson on "Paris, the Wicked City."

Being a Parisian, Mr. O'Rell was naturally interested in learning what an American would have to say about the gay capital of France and he promptly accepted the invitation. The lecture was delivered in a church and Mr. O'Rell was given a front seat. Mr. Johnson commenced his discourse and took his auditors from one den of iniquity into another. He pictured the wretchedness, the misery, the filth, and the licentiousness of "Gay Paree," and ended with a magnificent peroration admonishing all God-fearing, Christian people, as they valued their souls, to abstain from visiting that "hell of immorality."

By this time Mr. O'Rell concluded that Paris needed a defender, and he asked permission of one of the elders of the congregation to say a few words in reply, which permission was cheerfully accorded him. "I never knew until this hour how wicked and demoralizing Paris was, but in all fairness I desire to ask Mr. Johnson a few questions. Did he go to the Louvre and look upon the magnificent paintings of the masters of the Renaissance and also those of our own era? And was he not inspired by the sight? Did he look upon the masterpieces of the world's great sculptors, and did not his heart beat in rapturous admiration at those wonderful creations of the sculptor's art? But if he did not see all this, where did Mr. Johnson go?

"Did he go to the Champs Élysée and listen to the splendid military bands discoursing their concords of sweet sounds, the productions of the world's greatest musical composers, for the edification of Jacques Bonhomme and his family, who stood lost in admiration and listened with wrapt attention to the soul-stirring strains? If not, where did Mr. Johnson go? Did he visit the Church of the Invalides and look down on the tomb of the great Napoleon? And did not that sight inspire him with a melancholy awe—the while he rapidly reviewed the remarkable career of that remarkable man? If not, where did Mr. Johnson go? Did he visit the cemetery of Père la Chaise, and lay his tribute upon the graves of Héloise and Abelard, that Mecca for all those happy mortals whom Cupid's arrow had set ablaze with the heavenly fires of true love? If not, where did Mr. Johnson go?" And just about that time a little wizened man in the rear of the congregation arose and in a thin, piping voice exclaimed: "Johnson, for the Lord's sake, where did you go?" [Laughter and applause.]

And I have often been constrained, Mr. Chairman, after listening to the remarks of some of my colleagues on the other side who visited the Philippine Islands last summer, to ask them, "For the Lord's sake, where did you go?" [Laughter.]

For myself I believe that every American can be proud of what has been accomplished during the brief period of American occupation. Schools have been established in all the islands. In the Spanish days the principal schools were at Manila, Iloilo, and a few of the larger cities. The masses had to send their children to those places to get a smattering of an education. Under the American administration the schools have gone to the masses, and there is scarcely a town of any importance that has not to-day its free public school. There are 200,000 pupils already enrolled, as against a maximum enrollment of 30,000 during the Spanish occupation. Besides this, there are 20,000 adults attending night schools in the city of Manila, all eager to learn our language.

In the city of Jolo, on the island of that name, I found that there had never been a school of any kind until the Americans came, and to-day the native children are learning the rudiments of the English language at an American school in that city.

We have established civil government in a greater part of the archipelago, and in a large number of instances the governors of the provinces are native Filipinos. In those provinces which I visited where civil government had been established the natives were contented and happy. They were resuming their various occupations in the fields, and agriculture, the principal pursuit of the inhabitants, which had been neglected since 1896, was again attracting the attention of the husbandman. In the cities the people were employed at more remunerative wages than they had ever known.

The natives have been taught the necessity for sanitation, and in the city of Manila the death rate had been reduced one-half during the short time that our country's flag had floated over its ramparts. [Applause.]

Bands of ladrones and tulisanes were being dispersed everywhere, and to-day the islands are probably freer from roving bands of banditti than ever before in their entire history. Much of this is due to the efforts of the native constabulary, which was organized during the time that I was in the islands, and which has to-day developed into a splendidly equipped and excellently conducted branch of the public service. The native officers and men in the force have in numerous instances sacrificed their lives in the discharge of their public duties.

Courts of justice have been established, where for the first time in the history of the archipelago justice was being equally administered between rich and poor alike. I visited some of these courts and witnessed their procedure. Some of the natives did not hesitate to state that they preferred Americans for the bench. The writ of habeas corpus, which was entirely foreign to their former jurisprudence, has been introduced, and one enthusiastic Filipino attorney told me that this beneficent writ alone was a greater safeguard to their personal liberties than the most radical insurrecto had ever dreamed of.

Roads and highways were being built, and bridges were being constructed, all with a view of bringing the various towns and cities into a closer relationship with each other. Submarine cables, telegraph and telephone lines were being laid to the various islands, and the most remote barrios and pueblos were being brought into direct communication with the capital. Harbor facilities were being improved, and new works projected that, when completed, will give the city of Manila the finest harbor in the Orient.

These were some of the results of American pluck and courage and progress and patriotism that came under my personal observation, and I for one feel proud of the manner in which Americans have discharged the great burdens and obligations which they assumed at the time of the annexation of the islands. Instead of being a dark blot on our history, as some of the opponents of the Administration have been pleased to characterize the expansion policy, I boldly contend that future generations will applaud the patriotic endeavors of our countrymen in their noble efforts to bring peace and education, enlightenment and justice, to this poor downtrodden people that, until we came, had only known three hundred years of ignorance and superstition, tyranny and oppression. Sir, I contend that it is one of the brightest pages that illumines and will continue to illumine the annals of any nation that has ever existed. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we have heard much about the cruelties that have been practiced upon this unhappy people. The acts of individual officers and soldiers have been paraded before the world as though the perpetration of such outrages were the rule and not the exception. Our whole Army seems, at times, to have come in for more or less verbal castigation. I for one desire to raise my voice in protest against such sweeping charges or assertions. There may have been instances of cruelty now and then among individuals. But that is no reason for a wholesale condemnation of the entire Army.

Why, sir, I remember several notorious instances of cruelty and viciousness which occurred among the volunteers quartered at San Francisco—cruelties practiced in our own country and upon our own people—and yet I do not charge their responsibility upon the entire Army. I remember one day when a private, a member of the Tennessee regiment temporarily stationed at San Francisco, obtained a few hours' furlough, and boarding a street car, he visited several low groggeries, where he proceeded to gratify his appetite for whisky. Crazed with the liquor, he entered a public market where an inoffensive young German was wrapping up a roll of butter. It was almost the noon hour, and the young man's wife and child were awaiting the home coming of the husband and father for the noonday meal.

All unconscious of danger, he was busily engaged in the details of his daily vocation, when, without a word of warning, this brute of a soldier whipped his revolver out of his pocket and shot the market clerk through the forehead. He fell dead instantly. A more wanton, cruel murder was never committed in the distant Philippines; but I do not on account of the act of that one man desire to condemn his entire regiment. On the contrary, I have the highest admiration for the valor and daring of its officers and men. It was the same regiment that disembarked at Iloilo, after having already boarded the transport preparatory to sailing for the United States, disembarked because they had heard that the insurgents were making preparations to storm the town, and they did not propose to leave until the enemies of their country had been crushingly defeated.

It was this same regiment that contributed 300 of its members to the then newly organized regiments in the Philippines—300 men who had concluded, after their term of service as volunteers had expired, to reenlist and help finish up the work of pacification begun under the glorious Stars and Stripes. These are the deeds of that regiment that I love to recall; these are the acts of patriotism and valor that I love to recount, and the single act of that single soldier in San Francisco can never dim the luster of the heroic conduct of that noble company nor mar the glory of its patriotic deeds. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say that it was a soldier of the First Tennessee Regiment that did that?

Mr. KAHN. I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where was it done?

Mr. KAHN. In San Francisco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did not a jury of your own city acquit that young man?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, sir. Now, listen to me. They did it on the ground that the liquor which he drank had been drugged, but he has shot another man in the city of New York since then.

I believe General Sherman remarked that "war is hell!" It has undoubtedly been truly said that war itself is cruel; and if our soldiers have been guilty at times of excesses, while I do not condone their guilt, and while I believe that strict punishment should be meted out to the offenders, I can not forget that our men are fighting against foes who themselves have been guilty of the grossest treachery and cruelty. I am informed by Army officers that it is a common thing for men from the same town to enlist and, if possible, to enter the same company.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. The hour is very late or I should be willing to yield to you.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What I was desiring to ask you about was the matter that you just referred to, and if you go to another matter, I would not like to go back to it.

Mr. KAHN. I should like to finish my remarks, and then I will be pleased to answer any question the gentleman may ask. Sometimes brothers will be serving in the same company; where enlisted men have been friends before their enlistment the probabilities are that the ties of friendship will grow closer still.

Soldiers, after all, are only human beings, with all a human being's strength and weaknesses. It is reasonable to suppose that when a soldier finds the mutilated and bleeding body of his tentmate whom he had learned to love even as a brother—the tentmate whom he had left an hour before full of the spirit of life, the vigor of manhood—I say when he finds his comrade in arms treacherously slain and horribly mutilated, perhaps that soldier is not able altogether to smother his emotions, and he may commit some acts which in his calmer moments he would never have dreamed of perpetrating. I remember very well a speech of my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], delivered upon the subject of lynching during the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress. I will read a paragraph or two at this time:

> Mississippi had one lynching not long ago. It occurred in my district. Now, my friends, I want to tell you about it, not in justification, but in extenuation and explanation, and I want each man, when I tell him the facts in that case, to probe his own heart and ask himself if the veneer of civilization that is upon all of us would not have been scratched clear through and if perhaps he himself would not have gone with the crowd that did the lynching under the excitement of the moment.
> A man leaves his home—a farmer. He goes down to the little town of Canton to market and sells his crop. It is rumored in the neighborhood that he had brought money from the market town the week before and that it is in his house. That night six or seven negro men break into the house, ravish his daughter and his wife, and then manacle them and tie them together, and not only them, but the little children—one of them, I believe, four or five years of age—manacle them down in the center of that house and set it on fire and burn them all up, hoping that the fire had done away with all traces of the crime.
> One of the negroes happened to have a peculiar foot, which led to tracking him. That led to crimination and recrimination among the criminals and to a confession. It led to confessions from others. The people arose and lynched those men, and while they were lynching them they burned one of them, a voice coming from the crowd that he ought to receive the punishment himself which he had meted out to this innocent, helpless woman, her helpless daughters, and her helpless little children. It was a negro who, filled with indignation, asked and obtained the privilege of setting the match to the pyre.

I confess that I am unable to answer the question propounded by my eloquent and distinguished friend for whom I have a very high regard, as to what I would have done in the case he depicts, under the excitement of the moment, but I do know that the American soldier is like himself and like all of us, a human being with all a human being's frailties and passions. He is engaged in fighting a people who themselves eschew the arts of civilized warfare; he is himself often the victim of the grossest cruelty; he is no doubt, "under particular circumstances," so incensed and "provoked" that his poor "human nature can not resist"—and I protest that when you undertake to throw the mantle of charity over the refined and cultured art of lynching in this country it might be well to inquire a little into the provocations that prompted a few of our men to forget the glorious principles for which their country stands and to bring disgrace upon the uniform they wear without at the same time besmirching the good name and fame of thousands of those others whose every act in dealing with their country's foes was inspired by principles of humanity and forbearance. [Loud applause.]

And while upon this subject I desire to give the House a sample of the cruelties inflicted upon our boys in blue, which was called to my attention while I was at Calboyag, in the island of Samar.

Samar is a densely wooded island, with many water courses and few roads. There are a number of trails, however, and on several occasions the natives had dug pits along these trails, while in the bottom of the pits would be firmly placed exceedingly sharp and pointed bamboo splints about 12 inches in length. The pit would then be covered over with a thin, tough paper, which in turn would be covered over with a thin layer of earth and grass. In quite a number of instances soldiers fell into these pits, and the sharpened bamboo splints not only passed through the soles of their shoes but also through the very feet of the soldiers, making a most frightful and ghastly wound. That is simply an example of some of the methods of warfare employed by the insurgents in the island of Samar.

But I desire to say that so far as I was able to see—and I believe that outward appearances are frequently an indication of actual conditions—in all the towns which I visited where soldiers were quartered the relationship between them and the natives seemed to be most friendly. It was no uncommon thing to see one of our boys sitting in front of one of the native shops, laughing and chatting in the most friendly manner with a dozen Filipinos of both sexes. In many instances Filipinos told me that American officers and soldiers were their friends, and that they were not at all like the Spaniards. They did not treat the natives contemptuously as the Castilians had done, neither did they take anything from the natives for their own use without first buying and paying for it. This was the information I received in the islands regarding the character and conduct of the American soldiers there. Those are some of the facts that were presented to me, and I venture the assertion, and I challenge contradiction, that they truly represent the conditions that prevail generally throughout the archipelago.

Mr. Chairman, it must be the wish and hope of every American citizen that the perpetrators of cruelties and outrages in the Philippines be severely punished; but for the love of our country and its honor and fame let us stop and stop effectually this effort to besmirch the reputation of our entire Army, the integrity of its officers, and the valor of its men because of the conduct of a pitiful few of those officers and men.

Mr. Chairman, it is proposed by the minority that we withdraw from the islands in eight years and that we then proclaim the Philippines a free and independent nation. I desire in this connection and at this time to read again from the paragraph of the "Views of the minority" as to the ability of the Filipinos to govern themselves:

> Three centuries of Spanish dominion have destroyed all self-government in the Philippines, and its people at this time are unprepared for its exercise.

Here is a flat, frank, fair admission that three centuries of Spanish oppression have made the natives incapable of self-government; and then, in the very next breath, our Democratic brethren declare, in effect, that with the stroke of a pen, after eight years of tutelage in American methods of government, this unfortunate people can be elevated to a plane that it has taken the Anglo-Saxon races eight hundred years of progressive civilization to attain. [Applause.] I understand that the minority has since agreed to modify its views so that we shall retire in four years. Here is a tribute to Americans as teachers and to the aptitude of the Filipinos as students that I hardly expected to find coming from the ranks of the pessimistic Democracy. But the large majority of Filipinos tell us that they do not want independence; that they want to continue under the American flag.

Sir, I am everlastingly opposed to declaring any such policy of "scuttle" at this time. The minority need not delude themselves with the fatuous belief that their proposition, if adopted, will stop whatever insurrection there may be left remaining in the islands. On the contrary, it will give the irreconcilables—such of them as may be left—occasion for renewed activity. The printing presses of the Hongkong junta will again be kept busy grinding out new proclamations and pronunciamentoes from those Filipino jawbone patriots who fear to risk their own precious necks in the cause, and who, from a safe harbor of refuge, endeavor to stir up insurrection and strife in the islands, so that later on they may—as simon-pure, unwhipped, uncaptured, unreconstructed patriots—establish their rights to the jobs and the places in their native land as soon as the minority's programme of "scuttle" can be finally consummated.

I now have in my possession one of these junta circulars. They were scattered broadcast throughout the islands. This one was issued on July 17, 1900, at the time that there was considerable talk of the negotiations for peace in Manila. It was given me by Col. Robert Lee Bullard, of the Army, who found them being distributed among the natives in the islands. These self-styled patriots at Hongkong, from their coigne of vantage 700 miles removed from an American rifle, told the natives that "the negotiations for peace in Manila was prejudicing the cause and was favoring the reelection of McKinley."

They were too cowardly to take the field themselves, lest they might get hurt; but they were willing that the deluded, ignorant natives might keep up the struggle, so that ultimately they might step in and fill the offices if ever our Government should retire from the islands. I venture the prediction that within forty-eight hours after the Democratic policy of "scuttle," as set forth in the minority bill, should be adopted the fires of insurrection would be kindled anew, and woe to the future welfare of those Filipinos who have sworn allegiance to the United States Government. Burial alive, disembowelment, burning, decapitation, and a dozen other modes of cruelty and torture too horrible to contemplate would be their portion. The bloody record that already exists of inhuman treatment of natives supposed to be friendly to the American Government would be augmented a thousandfold. On horror's head such horrors would accumulate that all the tears of all the angels could never blot the record out.

Mr. Chairman, I am uncompromisingly opposed to any such proposition. We must hold the islands. Their strategic value to this Government has already been demonstrated. We all remember the fear, the dread, the consternation, the indignation, and the unspeakable horror that shook the civilized nations of the universe when the news was flashed around the world that the ministers of the foreign powers stationed at Pekin were besieged in their compounds by hordes of fanatical and bloodthirsty Chinese Boxers. Fortunately for us we had an army in the Philippines, and for once in its history our country did not have to appeal to any foreign power in the world to protect the life and property of its minister. [Applause.]

Instead, we were among the first to render aid and assistance to the representatives of other nations in a foreign land, and when the commanders of the allied foreign forces suggested a delay in the forward movement of the relief expedition until the arrival of the German troops, it was our own General Chaffee who was able to announce that it mattered not what others might do, but as for the Americans, they proposed to move forward to the relief of the besieged diplomats at once and without delay. [Applause.] Indeed it was an American soldier who was the first to scale the walls of Pekin. Sir, every American citizen can well be proud of the success of that energetic, aggressive policy which saved the lives of hundreds of men and women, which prevented the torture and massacre of helpless and innocent children, and which was made possible by our presence in the Philippines.

I say that one instance alone should have convinced our countrymen that the islands were worth all they had cost us. We did not have to lag behind, as too often has been the case in our history, but we led the vanguard. "Old Glory," carried aloft by brave American hands to bring its message of comfort and joy to the hearts of those unfortunates besieged behind the legation walls in Pekin, never went forth upon a holier mission; and by that act of ours, made possible, as I have said, by our presence in the Philippine Islands, we established forever American prestige in the land of far Cathay.

Sir, there is one instance in our national history where the policy of "scuttle," after being overwhelmingly repudiated at the polls, was, nevertheless, adopted by the then Democratic Administration. I refer to the "fifty-four forty or fight" campaign of 1844. It is true that when the question of our Oregon boundary came up in the Senate in 1846, a large majority of the Senators voted to ratify the treaty by which we relinquished all of that territory which is now known as British Columbia and which was embraced between 49° and 54° 40′ north latitude. All the leading Democratic newspapers of that period protested strenuously against this action. The Democratic President, in his inaugural and in his first message to Congress, unequivocally announced that we should never recede. But many able men in Congress in those days did not think that the country between 49° and 54° 40′ was worth fighting for, just as many Representatives in our own day and time do not think the Philippines worth fighting for, and so we relinquished our claims and gave up that valuable territory.

Not three score years have rolled by since then—and how short a time in the life of a nation is sixty years. We have learned to realize what a great mistake the policy of "scuttle" in 1846 has demonstrated itself to be. Why, sir, if we had held our ground at that period, England to-day would not have a single port on the Pacific Ocean side of the American continent. The commerce of the Orient coming across the Pacific would have had to pass through an American port. There would probably be no Alaskan boundary dispute to plague us at this time; and, sir, I for one do not propose, with my vote at least, to sanction another mistake of a similar character. [Applause.] The value of the islands has already been demonstrated to us in the Pekin matter. Let us hold on to them for future generations, after our people have had ample opportunity to demonstrate the wisdom of holding them or the wisdom of withdrawing from them, to decide what is best for the welfare of our own country, commensurate with the peace, the prosperity, and the happiness of the Filipinos, and the development of their native land.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the bill presented by the majority is a step in the right direction. I believe that it will meet with the approval, not only of the people of the United States, but also of the Filipino people. They are learning to know the true purposes of the American Government, and I am satisfied that the future will abundantly justify the policies of the lamented McKinley and the intrepid Roosevelt.

President McKinley's instructions to the Civil Commission under Governor Taft to my mind will always stand forth as one of the wisest, ablest, most erudite and patriotic state papers that ever emanated from the pen of any President of the United States. The native Filipinos have already learned to love, to honor, to respect, and to admire Governor Taft and his colleagues. The Commission has won their confidence. They have faith in the efforts of the Commission, representing as it does the people of the United States, in seeking to establish stable and suitable provincial and municipal government throughout the archipelago. They have begun to realize that we have not come among them to absorb their wealth nor exploit their resources solely for our own profit and gain. They are rapidly learning that we intend to give them the same blessings of civil and religious liberty that we ourselves enjoy.

Sir, it will not be many years before the predictions of Señor Fabie, of which I spoke at the beginning of my address, will be fulfilled. In a goodly number of towns which I visited in the Philippines, there still remained standing the bamboo arches that had been erected by the natives for the Fourth of July celebration. I was told that the Filipinos everywhere participated in those festivities, and that thousands of native children had sung our patriotic songs on our country's natal day. On the Lunetta, in the city of Manila, a military band discourses music every evening about dusk. The last number on the programme is always "The Star Spangled Banner." As the first note of the beloved national anthem floats out upon the soft, tropical air, every hat is reverently raised and the hum of conversation is hushed until the last note of that soul-stirring and inspiring melody has faded into the silence of the night.

I could not altogether suppress my emotion when I witnessed that, to me, never to be forgotten spectacle, and a vagrant tear fell from my eyes—a tear of earnest thanksgiving and joy at witnessing these people, who, three years earlier, had probably never known the existence of the great Republic across the Pacific, but who, having already learned a full measure of love and admiration for our institutions, thus silently and reverently saluted the song that represents to all American hearts the hopes and aspirations of this majestic nation. [Applause.] I thanked God that I was a citizen of that great Republic that had brought liberty and enlightenment to these 8,000,000 of human beings; that had introduced education and freedom where before had existed ignorance and intolerance; that had lifted up a down-trodden and oppressed race and placed them upon a higher plane of civilization than they had ever dreamed of, and that asked no greater reward than that they should be a loyal, patriotic, and enlightened people under the glorious Stars and Stripes. [Loud applause.]

APPENDIX.

NOTICIAS DE NUESTROS AGENTES EN AMERICA.

La calurosa actividad de la campaña electoral, de que tan extensamente hablábamos á V. en nuestra anterior, ha continuado, sin decaer un momento, sin entibiarse un solo dia, antes por el contrario quizás aumentando en intensidad: ambos partidos contendientes y numerosos elementos que hasta hoy habian, en cierto modo, permanecido alejados de la politica ó al menos indiferentes á sus mudanzas y vicisitudes, no descansan un momento en su labor de propaganda y aprestos para la cercana lucha: todos comprenden que ésta ha de revestir caracteres decisivos, que en ella se han de resolver de manera definitiva el porvenir de su pátria y puede asegurarse que estas elecciones han de ser las más reñidas, las más trascendentales quizás que se hayan efectuado nunca en el país, por lo cual vése palpablemente que no hay un ciudadano americano que en ellas no se interese con alma y vida, que no se disponga á tomar parte activa en la coraginosa contienda.

Esta por momentos se vá concretando más, por dias definiéndose mejor los caractéres que ha de revestir, en qué círculo cerrado ha de girar: demócratas contra republicanos, anti-trust y anti-expansionismo contra las nuevas tendencias de monopolio y colonización; Bryan contra McKinley. Los demás factores politicos que en segunda linea figuraban, los demás elementos de acción que conocemos, van, por la fuerza de la gravedad, siendo absorbidos por estos dos grandes grupos, compenetrándose con ellos, más y más por dias, hasta casi desaparecer del todo.

Las convenciones de los Estados para ambos partidos siguen reuniéndose con el fin de nombrar los delegados y adoptar las plataformas ó instrucciones que estos han de llevar á las convenciones nacionales que se reunirán, el 19 del actual la republicana y el 4 del entrante la demócrata; los acuerdos de estas convenciones parciales no dejan lugar á dudas sobre lo que acabamos de exponer, tocante al carácter que revestirá la lucha electoral cercana.

Desde nuestra carta anterior á la presente, se han reunido las convenciones democráticas y republicanas (de Estado) que siguen, por distritos enumerados:

Convenciones demócratas: la de Tennessee el 11 del pasado, la de Allegeny el 14, la de Franklyn el 17, la de Spokane el 19, la de Indiana el 23, la de Chicago en la misma fecha, la de Connecticut el 25, las de Clinton, Cortland y Catskill el 20, la de Nueva Jersey el 31, la de Nueva York el 5 del actual y otras varias de larga enumeración. En todas estas reuniones han prevalecido los temperamentos en favor de Bryan, que hacen segura su nominación en la convención general del partido, y en las diversas plataformas adoptadas resplandece unánime el espíritu anti-trust y anti-expansionista, más ó menos concreto en lo que respecta á nuestra causa pero siempre favorable, pues mientras algunas convenciones, como la de Chicago, por ejemplo, piden espresamente la Independencia de Filipinas, otras, como la de Nueva York, sin pronunciar palabra directa sobre nuestro país, indirectamente viénen á abogar por lo mismo acordando la abolición de todo impuesto de guerra y la observancia de la doctrina fundamental que establece que á la bandera americana debe seguir la libertad en todas partes.

Convenciones parciales republicanas. Se han reunido: la de Iowa el 10 del pasado, la de Colorado en la misma fecha, la de Kansas el 14, la de Hardfort el 18, la de Norfolk el 19, la de Minnesota en la misma fecha, la de Sioux Fall el 24, y algunas más. Todas estas convenciones se muestran unánimes en la nominación de McKinley y en apoyar su politica, y si alguna plataforma se ocupa de Filipinas es para hacerlo, según la consabida hipocrecía de su jefe recomendando la pacificación de las islas en primer término y, luego, su civilización para darlas la cantidad de Gobierno propio de que se muestren aptos sus habitantes.

De la candidatura Dewey apenas se habla ya: aunque él héroe sigue su viaje de exhibición y recorrido triunfal, y los Americanos patriotas le hacen ovaciones en todas partes, es lo cierto que ninguna convención se acuerda de él y que no será nominado en la general, frustrándose su proyecto de sustituir á Bryan. Ultimamente se le indicó como posible candidato para la Vice-presidencia, incluido en el mismo tiket de Bryan, pero este proyecto parece que tropieza con la séria dificultad de que otros antiguos y conocidos demócratas, entre ellos el Dr. Guidner, tienen adquirido un lugar para esta candidatura y serán preferidos por el partido y por su ilustre jefe, al efecto. Continúa, pues, el Almirante siendo una nebulosa en la politica americana y constituyendo una amenaza para Bryan, al que puede descontar votos, si bien ha perido por sus vacilaciones y la indefinida actitud en que se presenta, mucha de la fuerza ó prestigio politico con que surgió su presidencial candidatura.

La acción que cada dia se pronuncia más y que mayor fuerza va recabando, prometiendo ser de suma influencia en las próximas elecciones, es la de las Ligas anti-imperialistas. Antes solo dos, la de Boston y la de Chicago, laboraban con éxito, pero ahora otras varias, con ellas en relación, se han organizado y adquirido mayor preponderancia, desarrollando un trabajo tal que no tenemos palabras bastantes, después de haberlo visto de cerca, para el ogiarlo. Distinguense entre estas ligas, las de Nueva York y Cincinatti, nacidas—como recordará el Comité—al calor de las escitaciones de esta Comisión y alentadas, cuando pobres y pequeñas nacieron, por las comunicaciones y cartas de propaganda que dirigiamos á sus promovedores..... Hoy dichas Ligas, en éxito que nos envanece de todas veras y que agradecemos á sus iniciadores con todo el alma, cuentan con numerosas adhesiones y con foñdos que les permiten desarrollar su acción de propaganda y un gran prestigio ante el público. Han impreso numerosos folletos, discurses y alegatos de carácter anti-expansionista, que en copiosas ediciones circulan por el país y de los cuales enviamos al Comité muestras escogidas, y celebran meetings que son verdaderos éxitos como los que el 18 en Cincinatti y el 25 en Nueva York se efectuaron (y á los cuales tuvimos ocasión de asistir) en los que ilustres oradores, como el señor Croshy, los ex-ministros señores Boutwel y Schurts, el capitán O'Farrell y otros, hablan con la voz de la razón y la justicia en pró de nuestra causa, al pueblo americano, y alientan y estimulan á los tibios á tomar parte en la próxima lucha electoral á fin de salvar la democracia americana del abismo en que está próxima á derrumbarse.

A la fecunda acción de estas Ligasse debe en gran parte la actitud resuelta que elementos hasta hoy agenos á nuestra causa, van tomando: la Convención populista de Sioux Fall, que el 10 del pasado acordó ir á la lucha electoral enarbolando la bandera de la independencia de Filipinas y con el voto contra McKinley; la resolución tomada por la poderosa organización del Tammany Hall, que hasta hoy apoyaba á nuestro tirano y que se ha decidido á abandonarle en la próxima lucha; la acordada actitud de la asociación de Viajantes, que ofrece sus 50,000 votos á Bryan, aunque antes fueron del adversario; la opinión del respetable general Bealty, diciendo que los anti-imperialistas no necesitan elegir candidato, paes acertarán votando por el que luche contra McKinley; y así, menudean las manifestaciones de como la idea anti-imperialista se abre cada día más camino en las inteligencias y en los corazones. Durante estos últimos dias, hemos tenido ocasion de oir pluralidad de manifestaciones á tenor de las siguientes, que bastan para elocuentísima nuestra: "Yo—nos decia el señor Kiefer, acreditado industrial de Cincinati—soy un hombre de negocios, ageno siempre á la politica, pero en las propias elecciones lucharé con todo corage y haré que luchen todos mis amigos, para librar á mi pátria de esa vergüenza del imperialismo—Soy republicano de toda la vida—nos dijo con calor el señor Willy, politico prestigioso—y en las pasadas elecciones contribuí en mucho al triunfo de McKinley: ahora me propongo hacer más por derrotarle y acabar con sus infamias de politica de conquista.—Como éstos sieñten y hablan muchos.

En las Camaras también la cuestion filipina ha dado ocasión, durante el mes úitimo á nuevos reñidos debates: los señores Pettigrew, Allen, y Wellington, que tantas veces se ha señalado, sobre todo el ilustre Senador primeramente citado, nuevamente han hecho manifestaciones favorables á nuestra causa, contradiciendo á la Administración. El señor Allen acusó de falsario á Otis y la misma acusación se formuló, también en el Senado, contra el general Schwan por la carta que ha escrito al general Corbin, llena de calumnias contra nuestro país y de falsedades respecto al curso de la guerra.

La Administración, para impresionar al pueblo americano en sufavor y salir á flote en la dura campaña con que es por todas partes combatida, no cesa de dar noticias é informaciones desfavorables á nuestra causa: no sólo de la citada carta se ha hecho uso para dicho fin, sino de toda suerte de recursos y maquinaciones: un día dando por cosa hecha, por noticia confirmada, la muerte de nuestro bravo caudillo señor Aguinaldo; otro atribuyendo gran significación é importancia á las últimas capturas realizadas por las tropas americanas, como la del señor Paterno; ya haciendo alarde vocinglero de la decisiva influencia que sobre el país puedan tener manifestaciones de los resellados, como las últimamente hechas por los señores Buencamino y Torres, en favor de la sumisión á la soberanía americana; ora enviando al Congreso documentos, como la carta que el señor Legarda ha entregado, atribuida al Honorable Presidente señor Aguinaldo, previniéndole saliera de Manila antes de la ruptura de hostilidades, con lo cual trata de probarse que ésta fué voluntaria y premeditada por parte de los nuestros; bien haciendo que los generales americanos nieguen haber recibido ayuda alguna de los revolucionarios en la guerra contra España, como acaba de hacerlo el general Green que, cínicamente, ha afirmado no ser cierto lo que el señor Aguinaldo ha dicho sobre como salvaron los revolucionarios, en Maitubig, á su artillería, en la inesperada carga del teniente coronel Dujiols; unas veces anunciando quo espera grandes y próximos éxitos de la Comisión Taft; otras haciendo hablar á Otis, que ha llegado ya y no cesa de repetir su consabida cantinela sobre que la guerra está terminada, que la mayoría del país desea la soberanía americana, por la cual abogan sus hombres más instruídos, que los filipinos son incapaces del gobierno propio, etc., etc., Tal es la campaña electoral que hacen nuestros adversarios, que cuentan con muchos periódicos adictos, y tienen mucho oro, de los trust procedente, que se destina á la profusa distribución de folletos con los discursos pronunciados y los informes emitidos por los más caracterizados imperialistas en contra de nuestras aspiraciones y bien fundados derechos.

PROGRAMA OFICIAL DE BRYAN.

Combatir al Imperialismo. Conceder la independencia á Cuba. La autonomía en Puerto Rico. El protectorado en Filipinas. La supresión de los truts y la libre; acuñación de la plata.

No cesamos de repetirles lo que en nuestras cartas anteriores más de una vez les dijimos: resistencia, resistencia; solo élla nos conducira al triunfo.

NEWS FROM OUR REPRESENTATIVES IN AMERICA.

The earnest activity of the electoral campaign, of which we gave you an extensive account in our previous letter, has been going on, not being abated for a day or a minute, perhaps with ever-increasing intensity; both contending parties and numerous persons who had heretofore remained aloof from politics in a way, or at least indifferent to its changes and vicissitudes, are working hard and getting ready for the oncoming battle. Everybody realizes the fight will be of such decisive importance that it will determine in a definite manner the future of the country, and it can be assured that these elections will be the fiercest, the most momentous, that have ever taken place in the history of the Republic, for which reason there is no American citizen who does not concern himself with body and soul who has not decided to take an active part in this passionate contest.

What the character and nature of the issues will be can be ascertained better and better every day. Democrats against Republicans; opposition to trusts and antiexpansionism against the novel tendencies of monopoly and colonial policy; Bryan versus McKinley. The second-rate political parties we know of are being absorbed by these two great organizations to the extent of disappearing altogether.

The State conventions of both parties are holding their sessions with the object of nominating delegates and adopting the platforms and instructions which they will follow at the national conventions which will assemble—the Republican on the 19th and the Democratic on the 4th of next month. The resolutions of these State conventions leave no room to doubt as to the character of the future electoral battle.

Since our letter previous to this, some Republican and Democratic conventions have assembled, as follows:

Democratic conventions: That of Tennessee, on the 11th ultimo; at Allegheny, on the 14th; at Franklin, on the 17th; at Spokane, on the 16th; in Indiana, on the 23d; Chicago, the same date; in Connecticut, on the 25th; Clinton, Cortland, and Catskill, on the 20th; New Jersey, on the 31st; New York, on the 5th instant, etc. In all these conventions Bryan's candidacy has been favored; that his nomination at the general convention of his party is beyond doubt; and through the different platforms decided upon run a strong spirit of opposition to trusts and expansion, more or less explicit, but favorable at any rate in regard to our cause; for while some conventions, as that of Chicago, mention in direct terms the independence of the Philippines, others, as that of New York, favor it indirectly, as they have decided upon the abolition of every war tax and the fulfillment of the fundamental doctrine that liberty must follow the American flag everywhere.

Republican conventions: Iowa, on the 10th ultimo; Colorado, on the same date; Kansas, on the 14th; Hartford, on the 18th; Norfolk, on the 19th; Minnesota, on the same date; Sioux Falls, on the 24th, and so on.

All these conventions are unanimous in the nomination of Mr. McKinley, in supporting his policy, and if any Republican platform deals with the Philippines it is according to the usual hypocrisy of their chief, to urge, in the first place, the pacification of the islands and then their civilization, by granting them such amount of self-government as their inhabitants are fit for.

Dewey's candidacy is scarcely spoken of; though the hero is still on his tour of triumphant exhibition, and the American patriots give him splendid receptions everywhere, it is certain that in no convention his name has been alluded to and that he will not be nominated; his plan of replacing Bryan has resulted in a complete failure. Lately he has been indicated as a candidate for the Vice-Presidency on the same ticket with Bryan, but this scheme does not seem to work well since there are other prominent and old Democrats entitled to this distinction—Dr. Guidner, for instance—and who are preferred by the party and its leader. The Admiral is therefore but a nebula in American politics, and is a menace to Bryan; but at present the Admiral, on account of his irresolution, has lost much of his friends or prestige with which his Presidential candidacy was urged.

The element which increases in power and bids fair to exercise a great influence in the future elections is the anti-imperialist leagues. Heretofore those of Boston and Chicago alone were successful in their efforts, but at the present day some other organizations connected with the mentioned ones have been formed and gained much force, doing a work of such import that we do not find appropriate words to justly praise them. Foremost among these leagues stand those of New York and Cincinnati, which were born (as the committee will remember) from the suggestions of this commission, and were encouraged, when young and resourceless, by the advices and communications we sent to their promotors.

Nowadays these leagues, with a flattering success, which is cause for our rejoicing, have a large membership, resources sufficient to develop their action under an immense prestige before the people. They have printed a great many pamphlets, speeches, and petitions of anti-imperialistic character, which in numerous conditions are spread all over the country, and of which we sent to the committee some selected samples. They are holding really successful meetings, as those which took place in Cincinnati on the 18th and in New York on the 25th—we having had the pleasure to be present there—in which the illustrious orators, like Mr. Crosby, ex-Secretaries Boutwell and Schurz, Captain O'Ferrell, and others, spoke to the American people with a voice of righteousness and justice in behalf of our cause, and encouraged the lukewarm to take heart in the future elections in order to save the American Democracy from the imminent danger of falling into an abyss.

To the successful work of these leagues must be largely traced the active position which some elements hitherto indifferent to our cause are now taking; the Populist convention at Sioux Falls, which adopted as planks of their platform the recognition of the Philippine independence and the repudiation of McKinley; the resolution adopted by the powerful Tammany Hall, which before supported our tyrant and now has decided to desert him in the incoming election; the determination of the Association of Commercial Travelers to cast their 50,000 votes for Bryan, though they were before for his adversary; the statement made by the respectable General Bealty that the anti-imperialists need not elect a candidate, because they will do right by voting in favor of him who opposes Mr. McKinley; and in this way there is frequent evidence of how the anti-imperialistic idea is making its way into the intellects and hearts of the people.

Very recently we have listened to such utterances as the following: "I," said Mr. Kiefer, a well-known business man of Cincinnati, "am a business man adverse to politics, but in this election I shall fight with all my energy and have all my friends take part in it, so as to save my country from the shame of imperialism." "I am a lifelong Republican," earnestly said Mr. Willy, a prominent politician, "and in the past elections I did my best for Mr. McKinley's victory. Now I propose, however, to do much more to defeat him and his infamous policy of conquest." Many others feel and express themselves as this gentleman.

In both Houses of Congress last month the Philippine question was the subject-matter for furious debates. Senators Pettigrew, Allen, and WELLINGTON, most particularly the one first named, have openly admitted their support to our cause in opposition to the Administration. Mr. Allen accused General Otis of being a falsifier, and the same accusation was made against General Schwan, who wrote to General Corbin a letter full of calumnies against our country and falsehoods with respect to the cause of the war. The Administration, in order to favorably impress the American people and to overcome the immense difficulties which beset it, does not cease to give news and information unfavorable to our cause; nay, every conceivable scheme has been brought into play to attain this end, now taken for an indisputable fact the rumor of the death of our brave fellow-citizen, Señor Aguinaldo; again, overestimating the significance of the captures made by the American troops, as that of Señor Paterno, the next day boasting unnecessarily of the influence which the declarations of the "Resellados" (recoined) Señors Buencamino and Torres in favor of American sovereignty have on the islands at large, or sending to Congress documents, such as the letter delivered by Mr. Legarda and attributed to the honorable president, Señor Aguinaldo, warning the former to get out of Manila before the outbreak of the hostilities, with which it is intended to prove that this outbreak has been voluntary and premeditated on the part of our men; or causing the American generals to deny that they have received any help from the revolutionists in the war against Spain, as General Green has just done by cynically denying what Señor Aguinaldo stated as to how the revolutionists saved the American artillery at Maytorbig during the unexpected attack of the Spanish Colonel Dujiols; sometimes announcing that great and immediate results are expected from the work of the Taft Commission; sometimes making Otis speak, who since his arrival has never ceased to repeat that the war is over; that the majority of the people are in favor of American sovereignty, which is desired by the educated men; that the Filipinos are incapable of carrying on their own government, etc. This is the kind of electoral campaign in which our adversaries are engaged, who have numberless newspapers at their disposal and plenty of gold, the gift of the trusts, which is devoted to the widespread distribution of pamphlets with the speeches delivered and the reports made by the most notable imperialists in opposition to our aspirations and well-founded rights.

THE OFFICIAL PLATFORM OF BRYAN.

To oppose imperialism. To grant independence to Cuba. Autonomy to Porto Rico. Protectorate to the Philippines. Suppression of trusts and the free coinage of silver.

We reiterate what we have advised you more than once in previous letters: Resistance, resistance alone will lead us to victory.

JULY 7, 1900.

Cablegram received on June 30. Peace negotiations in Manila endanger our cause. They favor McKinley's reelection.

CENTRAL PHILIPPINE COMMITTEE.

HONGKONG, July 17, 1900.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, under the rule of the House the committee must rise.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to yield the floor. I wish to continue this evening with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin controls the floor.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2295, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9870. An act to correct the military record of Reinhard Schneider;

H. R. 3641. An act for the allowance of certain claims for property taken for military purposes within the United States during the war with Spain, reported by the Secretary of War in accordance with the requirements of an item contained in the sundry civil appropriation act approved June 6, 1900, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to investigate just claims against the United States for private property taken and used in the military service within the limits of the United States, etc.;

H. R. 11725. An act to amend section 4139 and section 4314 of the Revised Statutes;

H. R. 3442. An act to correct the record of John O'Brien;

H. R. 13204. An act to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9723. An act correcting the record of Levi Wells.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. 5718. An act providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or industrial plants in the Indian Territory;

S. 282. An act providing for the appointment of James W. Long, late captain, United States Army, a captain of infantry, and for placing his name on the retired list;

S. R. 92. Joint resolution providing for the publication of 200,000 copies of the Report on the Diseases of the Horse;

S. 4923. An act to ratify and confirm a supplemental agreement with the Creek tribe of Indians, and for other purposes;

S. R. 100. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for an equestrian statue of the late Maj. Gen. William J. Sewell, United States Volunteers; and

S. 5906. An act declaring the Osage River to be not navigable stream above the point where the line between the counties of Benton and St. Clair crosses said river.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 6070. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at a point to be selected, within 5 miles north of the Kaw River, in Wyandotte County, State of Kansas, and Clay County, State of Missouri, and to make the same a post route—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and

S. 6138. An act to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota as a public park, to be known as the Wind Cave National Park—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The House stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m., by Mr. CURRIER as Speaker pro tempore.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following conference report and statement to be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title.

A bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report and statement will be printed under the rule.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment after the word "large," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall not at any one time exceed forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That no money shall be expended or obligation incurred for architects after the plans for improvements above provided for have been approved by the Secretary of War, except that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to employ, in his discretion, a consulting architect at a compensation not exceeding $5,000 per annum."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. A. T. HULL,
RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
J. C. BURROWS,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The conferees on the part of the House submit the following statement on the action of the conference committee of the two Houses on H. R. 13676, "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903:"

Amendment No. 1 provides for traveling expenses of cadets admitted to the Academy from their homes to the Academy, and also increases the number of cadets at large by the addition of 10, making a total number of 40 to be appointed from the country at large.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment, and agrees to the same with an amendment providing that the total number of cadets appointed at large shall not exceed 40.

The agreement to the payment of actual traveling expenses was for the reason that since 1883 cadets at the Naval Academy have been allowed their expenses from their homes to the Academy, and for the further reason that it equalizes the expenses of the cadets by placing those living at a distance from the Academy on an exact equality with those living near the Academy.

No. 2 is simply a verbal amendment, and the House recedes.

No. 3 is simply an addition of the totals for three enlisted men, without changing the amount appropriated, and the House recedes.

Nos. 4 and 5 simply strike out quotation marks, which should never have been in the bill, and the House recedes.

No. 6 makes specific appropriation for athletic supplies, and the House recedes.

Nos. 7 and 10 simply refer to lights and strike out words which have been in the bill heretofore in regard to the Welsbach burner that are now considered surplusage, and the House recedes on both.

No. 8 relates to gauges for the water supply from two places only; and as the third place is added by another amendment later on, the House recedes.

No. 9 simply strikes out the brackets around certain words, and the House recedes.

No. 11 makes specific the power to provide for an increased water supply, and the House recedes.

No. 12 makes more specific the power under the bill to install the heating and lighting plant, and the House recedes.

No. 13 increases the appropriation $1,000,000, and the Senate recedes.

No. 14 relates to supervising architects and also to the purchase of the island commonly known as Constitution Island. The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment, and agrees to the same with the amendment which provides that no architect shall be employed after plans are approved, except that the Secretary of War may have a consulting architect, at a compensation not exceeding $5,000 a year. This entirely eliminates the purchase of the island, as provided for in the Senate amendment.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In pursuance of the order of the House, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2295.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KYLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2295.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would like to ask the chairman of the Insular Committee if he expects to use any more of his time just now?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, how has the time thus far been occupied?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. You have used about fifteen minutes of the night time.

The CHAIRMAN. At the conclusion of the evening session the majority side had used thirty-seven minutes more than the minority.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think we will not consume further time on this side until we have heard from the other side.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to my friend from Illinois [Mr. KERN].

Mr. KERN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the pending bill in its details. I have no inclination to take the proposed measure up clause for clause with a view of pointing out its imperfections or commending its merits. In my opinion, it is a useless waste of both time and labor to analyze this bill.

I deny the right of this Congress to construct constitutions and laws, to propose forms of government, or to establish governmental authorities for any alien people, and in my belief the people of the Philippine Islands constitute a foreign nation endowed with all the rights and powers and the capacity necessary to frame their own constitution, make their own laws, and construct their own government.

The proposition to enact the pending bill into a law is the first fatal step which the American Congress is taking in carrying out the monstrous plan of imperialism which has been mapped out by the Administration. It is now nearly four years since we have begun the work of subjugating, by the application of force, the people of the Philippine Islands, and the war has continued ever since and is now waging as actively and violently as it did at its beginning. But during those four years of warfare the responsibility of the inglorious venture has been on the hands of the Chief Executive of this nation. He has acted in the matter without authority from Congress, except what was conferred on him by a meager resolution. He has acted without the aid of the deliberations of Congress and independently from Congress. At no stage of the game did he do Congress the honor of asking it for advice or for counsel. He carried out the programme himself—single-handed and alone. Now Congress is asked to take a hand in the proceeding. The American Congress is asked to give a constitution to, and formulate a system of laws for, a foreign nation. In obeying the command the American Congress not merely humiliates itself, but it takes a grave departure from the basic principles upon which our Government is founded.

I believe that if the American Congress were left absolutely alone to exercise its own calm judgment and to employ its own candid intelligence freely and without molestation this bill would be overwhelmingly defeated. It would never have been reported to the House by the committee which had it in charge. The edict has, however, gone forth from the White House, and the bill must pass. The Taft Commission and the military autocracy over there must be vindicated in all of its acts and doings. The departure, new to American policy, must be taken. The American system of free and independent government and of absolute governmental neutrality must be changed into the dangerous system of colonization and conquest which obtains in Great Britain.

The American system may temporarily be changed by the arbitrary action of this Administration, but believe me, my colleagues, the change will be only temporarily. You may change the system, but you can never waver and you can never swerve the American people in the abiding faith which they have in the soundness of the policy of maintaining democratic institutions in all of their original simplicity nor in the fundamental idea that all just government rests primarily and ultimately upon consent.

I am fully aware of the fact that with the omnipotent lash of the Executive behind it as a persuader, this bill, objectionable and vicious as it is in all of its features and in the principles which underlie it, can be railroaded through this House. I have had occasion too often to observe the power which patronage wields. The patronage at the command of the President is tremendous. The effect of using it is not always purifying and ennobling. It is wielded too often to compel men to surrender their own firmly formed convictions and to arbitrarily adopt those of another man, although the two be diametrically opposed to each other.

In times like these it is not the best thing for the vital interests of the people of our Republic for both Houses of Congress and the Chief Executive as well to be of the same persuasion politically. By the crafty use of patronage it is useless to deny that the President too often deprives the representatives of his own party of that character of independence which should be left unimpaired in the legislative department of the Government and by that means absolutely controls both Houses of Congress. Centuries and centuries ago the eloquent prophet Isaiah must have had this sort of a condition in his mind when he gave utterance to the significant words, "The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib." [Laughter.]

It is nevertheless true that you can not reconcile this step which you are about to take in the programme of misnamed expansion, that of making laws for an intelligent and Christian people, or any other kind of a people, for that matter, located many thousands of miles away from our shores, who have not invited us to perform this task for them and who have given emphatic expression to their unwillingness to live under and obey the laws we make for them, with the spirit of American Democracy and Republicanism. You are taking a fatal and serious departure from the principles of government which Jefferson enunciated, Washington contended for on the field of battle, and which Abraham Lincoln so valiantly defended, even unto death.

It is contended that we can make a better government for those people than they can make for themselves. The vital question involved here, it seems to me, is not so much a question of good government as it is a question of self-government. Our own splendid Government, in the opinion of many philosophers and statesmen in other lands, is itself far from having reached the acme of perfection. I do not doubt but that there are many wise men and profound thinkers living abroad to-day—twentieth century Platos, Rousseaus, and Volneys, as it were—who are confident in their own conceit that they could construct for the American people a far more perfect system of government than the one which they enjoy. Yet, did some foreign power attempt by force of arms to compel us to abandon our system and to adopt in its stead a system made to order for us in some foreign country, however more perfect that foreign-made article might be, theoretically and in reality, we would bitterly resent the invasion, even to the extreme of shedding the last drop of American blood in uncompromising resistance and seeing the last vestige of American substance licked up by incendiary flames.

The evidence is voluminous, and it is thoroughly conclusive to any mind open to conviction that the people of the Philippine Islands can be safely trusted with the management of their own affairs, and are, beyond peradventure, capable of self-government. They are a Christian people. They worship the same God mankind throughout the length and breadth of all Christendom worships. They believe in the same forms of worship. They derive their lessons of obligation to their fellow-men, of divinity and immortality from the same holy book. They sing the same sacred hymns. They kneel before altars of the same description, and their choirs sing the same melodious pæans of divine praise in the same kind of churches.

We learn, furthermore, from positively reliable sources that there is less illiteracy in Luzon than there is in Massachusetts. The leaders of thought among the Filipinos have been educated in the leading universities of the world. The people have access to excellent schools, where they are well educated in their own language. It is true that they are not all profound scholars, but neither is profound scholarship universal in any other country, perhaps to the inestimable benefit of that country. Their habits and customs are spoken of in the highest terms of admiration by people who have traveled extensively on the archipelago and are recommended as being in many respects worthy of even our own emulation. The inhabitants of the islands are said to be thrifty, temperate, and devoted to family ties and to domestic life, and they are given to the habit of attending strictly to their own business and leaving that of other people religiously alone.

Here, then, we have 10,000,000 people who are yearning for liberty and for the right to govern themselves, and least of all does it become ourselves as American freemen, whose boast it has always been that their country is the asylum of the oppressed which offers a secure haven of refuge for those of other lands in quest of freedom, and whose Titan forefathers themselves amid the deafening roar of shot and shell refuted forever every argument that may be urged in favor of a colonial system. Yet this day is the American Congress found in the inconsistent and incongruous act of attempting to foist upon the people of the United States the tyrannous and burdensome makeshift of colonialism which has made Great Britain the reproach and a stench in the nostrils of the modern world.

We have this day in the Philippine Islands, and we have had for the last four years, a large body of armed soldiers killing and destroying every human being that insists on asserting the natural right of a people to govern themselves and asks for freedom, and this by way of paving the road toward carrying thither the system of government which we are constructing here now, and arriving there with the shop-made thing, to impose it upon those unwilling people for their acceptance without giving them a voice or any kind of representation whatever in the framing of a single statute.

We are told by the President that the Executive, with the instrumentality of the Army, has about cleared the ground and swept the field sufficiently clean so that the time has come when the legislative department of our Government may do its part in the programme of usurpation and make to order a system of hand-me-down laws to be hauled over there and delivered ready-made for the future bliss and beneficence of the benighted Filipinos. He informs us in solemn tones that the insurrection has about been stamped out. He tells us that if we will just stand still, quit thinking for a little while, and quit talking the job will presently be finished.

What job? The job of stifling the voice of every man and woman and child in the Philippine Islands who demands liberty and the recognition of the natural right of self-government. How finished? Finished by killing those who will not yield to the water cure, hurling others into prison, and bribing some.

In this promise there is not much consolation for a self-respecting American whose heart still thrills and throbs to the inspiring music of the old battle songs of freedom.

But even at that, take good care, my colleagues, that this self-confident assurance is not again the old ante-election promise. Ever since the war in the Philippines has been waging we were given assurance and were promised just before the election, and that on two noteworthy occasions before this one, that the insurrection was gasping in the last throes of peaceful death, and still there is no cessation of hostilities, and perhaps there will not be as a matter of plain truth for some time to come.

Of the fact that there ultimately will be a cessation of hostilities if we continue to persist in our work of slaughter and despoliation there can not be the slightest doubt. It does not require a prophetic vision to see the finish of it all. Eighty millions of people equipped with the latest and most terrible implements of modern warfare, blessed with fabulous wealth, pitted against ten millions of poorly equipped and primitively armed people, with their country invaded, their productive energies seriously impaired and almost totally checked, must triumph in the end, even in offensive warfare conducted under all sorts of difficulties and in spite of seemingly insurmountable obstacles imposed by nature.

It was but a few weeks ago when we saw that sort of an incident closed. We witnessed the melancholy spectacle of mighty England overpowering and conquering a pair of weak Republics, after years of brave and heroic resistance, at the cost of immense treasure and unnumbered lives. With their stout hearts breaking, the intrepid Boers finally realized that it was hopeless and needless to prolong the unequal struggle against overwhelming odds any longer. In utter despair they finally laid down their rifles and surrendered to the merciless conqueror.

When the collapse came, instead of England hiding her face in shame in view of the infamous job which she had completed, in contemplation of her own thousands of brave sons who had turned their pallid faces to the stars and lay buried in unmarked trenches, and of the women and the children in grief and mourning who were to be their future subjects and fellow-countrymen, England went wild with exultant frenzy, and London threw itself into a licentious debauch and drunken saturnalia which horrified and disgusted the civilized world. Men and women staggered along the streets of London in an utterly maudlin and irresponsible condition, shrieking and yelling and babbling like mad men and like untamed savages; and in the course of the disgraceful orgy the respectability of London even was shocked by the commission of numerous foul and revolting murders committed on the public streets, not to allude to the other harrowing scenes of unnamable immorality and tumultuous riot which helped to make the disheartening picture complete.

God forbid that the day shall ever come when those scenes of disgusting and disgraceful and horrifying scandal shall be repeated in free America. God forbid when the sounding of the death knell of infant republics will ever produce that kind of rejoicing and that kind of manifestations here in the United States. God forbid that when the day comes that the commanding general in the Philippines wires to us the intelligence that the last resisting Filipino chief—like De Wet, fame-crowned for time everlasting—throws down his arms and says, "We submit. We are overpowered. We are conquered. It is useless to fight any longer. We can not contend against the inevitable. God wills it so. We are helpless and palsied now. We yield." God forbid that when that day comes a single American part his lips to raise one cheer of exultation or of joy at the barren triumph. [Applause on Democratic side.]

England may celebrate the victory, but if England harbors the delusion that those intrepid Boers will bend their necks willingly to the yoke, England is sadly mistaken. England may have conquered the Boers, but has she broken the proud spirit of those fearless men and peerless women who laughed at death and scorned carnage? No, never. Even if England had vanquished the Revolutionary forefathers in our own country, no one but a man in the last stages of incurable insanity would for a moment believe that England could hold the United States to-day, or that the British flag would still be flying over these dominions. Pigmies can not hold giants in subjection long. The South African child will grow into a giant. It will outgrow England herself. I make the prediction here and now that another mighty nation will grow up there, second only to the United States. The spirit of liberty will survive in it, and a dozen Englands with all their redcoats can not stamp it out.

But England's treatment of the Boers was more humane and more considerate than that which we are offering to the Filipinos to-day. The Boer generals had a hand in writing the peace terms. They were represented at the conference. They dictated conditions which were adopted. The British Parliament did not dare go to the autocratic extreme of framing a constitution and formulating a system of laws for the Boers without consulting a single man in South Africa, and it did not dare to transgress to the extent of taking that kind of a shop-made constitution and code to South Africa and say to those people: "Here! Take this. It is the perfection of reason. It is the climax of human wisdom, framed and constructed for your especial benefit by ourselves, a set of men who are vastly your superiors in knowledge and learning and experience, vastly your superiors in Christianity and civilization, vastly your superiors in morality and progressive thought." England did not dare go to that arbitrary and insulting extreme.

The last nation on earth that ought to dream, even in its most delirious moments of ecstacy, of conquering with shotted guns and drawn saber a people that craves to be self-governing and free are the American people. The procedure is utterly unnatural and involves a complete reversal of every single solitary lesson which our history teaches us. It takes the sacredness and the romance and the poetry out of every tradition we treasure and shatters them all into countless fragments and throws them to the ground.

A few weeks ago we witnessed the impressive spectacle, with all of its beautiful and heart-inspiring ceremonies, of unveiling a flag-draped monument, across the avenue from the White House, a block away from the statue of Lafayette, coming as a gift to the Republic of America from the Republic of France, to perpetuate the memory of Rochambeau. The Republic of France sent a delegation of her most distinguished citizens to attend the simple and the democratically grand festivities. The memory of General Rochambeau is that of a soldier, a statesman, a philosopher, and a patriot, who came to the rescue of the American people in the most trying hour of their sore distress while they were fighting for liberty and the right to govern themselves. He came to our rescue in Revolution's darkest hour, when not a single star was left to glitter hopefully in the skies. Without his aid and the aid of Lafayette and the aid of Steuben, Washington, like the great De Wet, might have been compelled to throw down his sword, unsheathed in defense of liberty, and to affix the signature of his immortal name to the terms of what would have been at least a temporary, ignominious, and galling surrender.

On that occasion the President in his address of welcome fittingly and touchingly directed the attention of the representatives of the French Republic to the work which our Republic had done in aiding bleeding Cuba in her hour of distress, and in helping the people of that country to secure for themselves the blessings of liberty and popular government. Cuba will one day raise monuments to the memory of her American liberators. But on the incident now on in the Philippine Islands the President maintained a discreet and diplomatic silence. He did not dare look westward when he spoke. And yet the world would rejoice if the Philippine republic would one day be given the opportunity to also raise monuments to the memory of immortal American liberators.

The war in the Philippine Islands affords the only scene to the world to-day where human blood is being shed on battlefields. The only spot on earth where armed forces are arrayed against each other in hostile camps is on the Philippine Archipelago. On the one side is a people that has committed no other offense than that of asking for liberty; on the other a great Republic which has always boasted of its love and loyalty and devotion to the principles of liberty. That that war should continue for one hour longer is a shame and a disgrace. It is an outrage on humanity itself. It is idle to say to the American people and to the world that the shedding of blood in the Philippine Islands can not be made to cease. We have never made the effort. We have never tried to put a stop to it on any other terms except those of extermination or unconditional surrender. We have never even treated the Filipinos with decent respect. We have persistently refused to give them credit for being the Christian and civilized people which they certainly are.

You talk about wanting to give them independence and the liberty which they are seeking, but on no occasion has the Administration offered it to them. It has never listened to their pleading. It has turned scornfully away from the pitiful cries of those people. It has never promised them independence. It has never offered them liberty. Surely this Congress ought to concede to them the unqualified right of framing their own constitution, just as Europe was compelled to concede it to us notwithstanding the fact that legislative bodies in Europe solemnly and officially declared that the American colonies were utterly incapable of self-government, and that they could not safely be trusted with liberty. We ought to concede to those people the right to formulate and make binding their own laws, be they good or bad, just the same as Europe was compelled to concede that right to the American colonies after they had thrown off the yoke of foreign despotism, and were starting out in the garb of freemen to carve out their own destiny on the broad highway of human liberty.

You say you can not stop the war? Yes, there is one man in America, one individual in all the world who can stop that war and stop it to-morrow. The name of that man is Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States.

I say to you, Theodore Roosevelt, if you are in earnest in your loud professions and your repeated declarations that you want those people to have their liberty and their independence and that you wish to concede to them the right to govern themselves, say the word, and the Congress and the people will back you up in it, and hostilities will cease to-morrow. You are the only living man in all the world at this moment who can say that word and make it count. You are the only man who can say it effectually.

In England they are preparing now to go through the hollow mockery of placing an unearned crown upon the brainless head of an undeserving royalist, dubbed King. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That stupid ceremony will be followed by another debauch and another series of orgies similar to those witnessed when De Wet threw down his blood-stained sword in despair, a vanquished freeman.

Let the President of the United States extend the blessing of liberty and order to the people of the Philippine Islands, and the American people will have a coronation, too, this summer. They will crown their President, not with a golden crown bespangled with ill-gotten diamonds filched from blood-soaked South African fields, but with a modest crown of laurels, emblem of peace, happiness, and good will toward all mankind, and all oppressed humanity will arise to bless him as a liberator and a benefactor of his race, while the men and the women and the little children in the Philippine Islands will arise and, waving their sun-browned arms and sun-browned hands, do the cheering, instead of walking to the rear, with frowning faces—unwilling, revengeful, sullen, conquered subjects.

Theodore Roosevelt, acting in the capacity of President of the United States, has the power to stop the war. No sensible man will question or deny that fact. Let him make his bluff good. The ante-election assurances that the war is over, let me assure you, my colleagues, will not "stay put" this time. The people are enlightened. They can be deceived no longer. If the war is over, as he assures us it is, let him give us tangible evidence of the fact by calling the troops home and mustering the soldiers out of the service. If the war is not over, then I say let this Congress refuse to legislate for a foreign and reluctant nation, and let the President continue to have the glory of it and with it the shame.

We boast of the fact that we are a Christian people. We preach the teachings of the Man from Galilee in our churches and at our firesides, but the doctrines of Christianity must be practiced to be effective. It was the lowly Nazarene who used these words, pregnant with meaning: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do you even so to them. That is the law of the prophets." And in my creed the Golden Rule is better than a golden crown, no matter how heavy it be and no matter how many diamonds bestud the medieval diadem. I, for my part, would not take my hat off to any crowned head at any time or anywhere, but I would cheerfully uncover my brow any day before the humblest mortal that practices the Golden Rule.

Macaulay said: "That is the best government which desires to make the people happy and knows how to make them happy." Neither the people of this country nor the people of the Philippine Islands can be truly happy so long as even the form of war is maintained on the Philippine Archipelago. The way for us to be happy is to make those friendless people happy. Give them sincere assurance that they will be granted independence, as Cuba enjoys it now, and the war will be over.

Nor do I care who struck the first blow. It is immaterial to me what this or that American officer is supposed to have promised. It is a matter of no concern to me in this connection what the character of Buencamino or Aguinaldo is, or what the character of Luna was. It is now a mere historical incident what occurred on this or that particular date. We may prate about these things all we want to, but these occurrences and matters are not arguments that affect the case one way or the other. If this controversy is not above the level of a prize fight, it is not worthy of a moment's serious attention in a dignified and responsible body like this. If it is not a broad and deep question of principle that is involved here, and I believe it is, we ought to cease meddling with it.

It is not necessary either that you own a people in order that you may trade with them. It is entirely within the realm of possibility for us to have the most favorable trade relations conceivable with the people of the Philippine Islands without owning them. Let us secure their good will, and trade will follow that more surely than it will follow the flag.

The opposition in this controversy is so free to use the trick of urging that criticism of our present Philippine policy is tantamount to antipathy and antagonism to the Army.

The trick is a mere subterfuge, utterly unfair and utterly reprehensible. I have not met a soldier yet who had returned from the Philippine Islands, and who was not looking for a Government job, or some other sort of governmental favor, who had one word of commendation or approval for our policy in the Philippine Islands. No man has a higher regard for the American soldier than I have. I would deny the soldiers in the field no sort of comfort. I would concede them every form of pleasure they could have in civil life. I would even give them their canteen back, which you stubbornly refuse to do. But I protest most emphatically against employing this Philippine conquest business as a means and as a pretext for saddling the antiquated and nefarious European system of militarism permanently upon the American Republic.

I protest against this Congress legislating for an unwilling people. I protest against this Congress legislating for a people which has had no hearing before our committees. I protest against wars of conquest. I protest against the further continuation of this war. I protest against the wholesale slaughter and the threatened extermination of a people who are guilty of no other crime than that of asking for liberty. I protest against punishing a people who are simply demanding that the principles of the American Declaration of Independence be extended over their humble homes, and I think the time has about arrived when this Congress ought to pay some attention to the social and political needs of our own people here at home instead of giving all its time to bulldozing and bullyragging people in distant island possessions in the sole and exclusive interests of American commercialism, a horde of American office seekers, American monopolistic greed, and the growing and menacing spirit of American imperialism. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, the few remarks of a most peaceful character that I have in my mind toward the development of our new possessions have almost been driven out by the terrible arraignment by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KERN] of the terrible state of war and the condition that existed in the Philippine Islands. But I trust the gentleman will possess his soul in patience, for the facts of the case are in direct contradiction to the affairs which seem to stir his very soul to its depths.

The army of 70,000 men that it was necessary to maintain in the Philippine Islands to enforce the law, that the majesty of this Goverment might be obeyed by all those who have come under its jurisdiction, has already been reduced to 30,000 men; and if my friend from Illinois had read yesterday's paper, he would have seen that the orders had already gone out from the War Department ordering a further return of troops and that the small number of 19,000 men are to be left in these now pacified Philippine Islands, which are to be handed over, and are being handed over daily, to the civil control established by the Commission sent out by the President and this Congress for that purpose. These alarming speeches, these great fears, as expressed by the Democratic party, are simply evaporating into thin air when they are met by the stern recital of facts.

But, Mr. Chairman, the few words I have are on a much more peaceful plan. It is almost impossible, sir, in the short time that is allowed debate under the pressure, for those who wish to participate, to criticise or to go into detail of the provisions of a bill that covers 50 pages of typewritten matter as it comes from the Senate, and covers 50 more pages in the substitute offered by the committee of the House.

But, sir, there are two provisions which the House maintains and to which I wish to give my thorough adhesion. The one is that the great battle which has been fought out in the political arena and in the halls of legislation of our country as to a proper monetary standard that should be established in our commercial transactions should be founded on the gold standard in every terrritory and in every business community that is under the control of our Government. [Applause.]

That is the issue that has been fought out at the polls, and the American people have always given a proper verdict on every great question that has been submitted to their judgment. That is the standard of our country by the voice of the American people, and I for one question the wisdom and doubt the judgment that proposes to erect a different standard in any portion of our country, never mind how many miles or what conditions exist in its territory.

The second one which the House puts forward in opposition to that advanced by the Senate is that these people should have a representative local legislature. Mr. Chairman, when this question was found to be liable to come before the legislature of our country I made a careful study of the provincial governments as adopted by England, and one of the wisest provisions it struck me in the study of the history of long experience in provincial government was that the sooner you give the people the right to participate in self-government and bestow upon them that sense of responsibility which makes good citizens, which makes the people take an interest in their government, the better. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I subscribe myself most heartily, and hope the House will insist on that provision.

Mr. Chairman, there is another question now pending between the two Houses of Congress which to my mind, in the peaceful vein in which I propose to speak, will do more to develop the prosperity of the Philippine Islands and to bind us more strongly together with its principal country than any other measure I know of. We all have realized, we know in our country, that the fearful ones, before it got its great geographical area, were afraid that our Republic might disintegrate, but the iron bands of the railroad and the bands of the telegraph have annihilated distance so that the man who picks up his morning paper in San Francisco is as fully informed of what goes on in the national capital as though he lived closer to its limits.

So, sir, in my judgment the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama or Nicaragua will do more to develop the commercial resources and the trade intercourse between our country and our new possessions than perhaps any legislation, however wise in its provisions, that may be enacted by the National Legislature.

When the Nicaragua bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce there were some of us who thought that perhaps we should wait a while longer for further information. Appreciating the great work done by the able chairman and the hard working committee, all that we asked was that some little time might be allowed for further investigation. This view was enforced by the fact that new conditions had arisen since that committee had made its report. Nay, more; new conditions had arisen since the report of the Commission which had been authorized by this Congress at an expense of $1,000,000 to report upon the feasibility and practicability of the two different routes; and we hold the view that the Commission should be allowed to report under the new circumstances.

It was very curious, Mr. Chairman, to observe how, as human intellect interprets the decisions of other men, different conclusions were reached by members of the House in debating the question in this Hall. Some thought that the first report of the Interoceanic Canal Commission was an absolute decision in favor of the Nicaragua route.

Others adopted the interpretation that, according to the report, the Panama route was not under consideration by the Commission, for the reason that at the time of their report, and at the time the bill was reported from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, there had not been a practical offer with reference to the Panama route. In fact, I may go further and say that there was at that time no offer that was considered from the French Interoceanic Canal Company. Since that time that company has made a definite offer of $40,000,000. Since that time the Commission has made a supplemental report; and it is proven that those who had adopted the view that the Commission had not the French proposition under consideration were right in their interpretation.

The bill has now come back after careful consideration in the Senate with the stamp of approval of that body. And we have the report of the Commission unanimously in favor of the Panama route. The measure is now in conference between the two Houses.

Mr. Chairman, a sensible man who employs a lawyer will not go to him unless he has full confidence in him. Any man who employs a doctor will not seek his professional services unless he has full confidence in him.

So, sir, it would be a foolish patient or a foolish client who, after consulting his legal adviser or his doctor, would not follow the advice so given. That is the position I wish to occupy. I wish to call the attention of my colleagues in this House to the consideration that we, as laymen, will take a great responsibility if we undertake to put our judgment, however sincere and however honest, against the unanimous report of the Commission which has reported in favor of the Panama route.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether any superior commission could be found in our country. Nay, I will be broader in my assertion and say that I doubt whether an abler body of men could be found anywhere. Their patience and care, the deliberation which they have exercised in all their dealings, their absolute fairness in all their statements, nothing being put forward except what was founded on absolute fact, ought to inspire confidence and sway the judgment of this House on this important question.

Less than two hours ago it was my privilege to have a conversation with Admiral Walker, who has never lifted a hand to influence legislation in these halls, and therefore what I say I wish to be distinctly understood as coming from him through me simply on my behalf, I having sought information from him on this subject. He authorized me to say that he considers this——

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is not in order for the gentleman to discuss the Nicaragua or the Panama Canal bill in this debate, under the rule that we have adopted. My understanding is that the rule confines the debate to the bill under consideration—the bill for the government of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. ADAMS. Allow me to state that I inquired of the Chairman and the gentleman in charge of this bill as to the effect of the rule and the bearing of my remarks, and it was only after such consultation that I ventured to indulge in the line of remarks which I have followed.

The CHAIRMAN. Ordinarily the construction which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] has followed in regard to the line of debate permissible in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union would be correct; but under the special order of the House adopted in the present case, the debate must be devoted only to the pending bill. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. ADAMS. I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from Texas that he did not interrupt me until my fifteen minutes had expired. [Laughter.] I ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The rule expressly provides for that.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, after more than three years of evasion the Republican party is at last forced to take the American people into its confidence and declare its intentions and purposes toward the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. The bill which is now offered us by the majority, providing for civil government in the Philippines, contains no hope of our withdrawal from these islands either now or hereafter; no promise of liberty or independence to the Filipino people either in the present or future. And so at last the mask is thrown aside, and we are boldly told by the Republican leaders that these islands are to be held and treated as conquered provinces, and their inhabitants ruled and governed as a vanquished and subjugated race.

There is now no more deceit, no more dissimulation, no more hypocrisy; for this much at least we may be thankful.

Mr. Chairman, at the time the treaty of peace between Spain and this country was signed two courses were open for the American people to follow: One, to assist the Filipino people to establish a government of their own, grant to them liberty and independence, and leave them to work out their own destiny, as we did with Cuba. To have followed this course would have called for no waste of treasure, no use of military power, no sacrifice of life, no shedding of human blood. The other course was to smother by force the demand for independence among these people, to crush out by military power any desire for liberty, and to hold them in political servitude and bondage.

The Republican party from the outset chose the latter course. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that they did not make their purpose known to the American people; in fact, every evasive artifice and subterfuge was resorted to to conceal this purpose. Now, at the end of a little more than four years we are able, as a people, to look back over their work, to count the cost, and weigh the benefits. During all this time they have been in absolute control of this Government; they have had the House, the Senate, and the Executive; they have had the Army and the Navy. If any mistakes have been made they are responsible for them, and if any benefits have accrued they are entitled to the credit.

During the time we have been holding these islands every effort has been made to win the American people away from their old-time ideas of liberty and send them chasing after "new idols and strange gods" in order that they might be the better prepared to accept and approve of the infamous and unholy purpose which is now for the first time fully disclosed. In order to bring this about, a number of remarkable arguments were used, some of them not altogether new to history. Among them, that old claim of "destiny" was advanced, that specious falsehood of kingcraft which has been urged in support of every act of political tyranny and oppression in every age of the world, and which it was believed was at one time shot to pieces by American bullets on the battlefields of the Revolution.

But with canting hypocrisy it was proclaimed from high-priced pulpits and from the stump that it was a part of God's great plan that we should go to the Philippine Islands in order that we might carry the blessings of Christianity and civilization to the millions of human beings who were there dwelling in ignorance in the dark corners of the world. And it was hinted at the same time that nothing of this kind would have occurred had not the Republican party been in power on this occasion, as quite a considerable portion of the Republican leaders do not hesitate to give expression to the belief that God never does anything for this Government or its people while the Democratic party is in control.

It is written, "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth," and there is one thing which has always impressed me with this "destiny" argument. If it is true that it is the appointed will of God that the gang who now control the Republican party are to continue to rule and govern the Filipino people, then, in view of all that has happened and is still happening there, I am profoundly impressed with the great love which the Lord must have for the Filipino people. [Laughter and applause.] They will certainly need some Moses to lead them out of their bondage, and when that time shall come there will not be enough wealth remaining among all their tribes to erect a golden calf.

Mr. Chairman, I am neither a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I undertake to say that whenever the Lord has any message to give to that crowd he will send for them, and the performance of the task which he assigns them will call for their immediate presence in a place hotter than the Philippine Islands, where the practice of the "water cure" is unknown, and where, to say the least, no rainy season will interfere with the campaign. [Great laughter and applause.]

Having used the "destiny" argument to quiet the scruples of some, they then presented the business side of the proposition and told of the money there was in it, and they sent some of their orators to these islands in transports at National Government expense; there to bask in the shade of the Tropics to study the question, and when they returned to our shores we were told tales that were marvelous and wonderful about the wealth and resources of our new possessions, and some of them showed nuggets of gold, "finer than the gold of Ophir," which they said had been found there, and declared that the precious metal could there be obtained in great abundance. They spoke in a grand and lofty way of our trade with the Orient, and drew glowing pictures of how the ocean transports in the future would plow their way across the mighty waters of the Pacific in an almost endless stream, freighted down with the products of the American mine, the American factory, and the American farm, there to find a ready market, and that these vessels would return loaded with the wealth of the Orient, to be scattered broadcast among our people. And this appeal to avarice and greed deceived many.

But, Mr. Chairman, the men who are moved by this argument of trade are practical men, and now at the end of four years they demand a summing up of the books, a balancing up of accounts, in order to ascertain how much of profit or of loss there is in this venture. It was stated that "trade followed the flag." The flag has been held there by force for more than four years, and now the American people desire to know how much it has cost to keep the flag there and how much of a trade has followed it. If we have a market there for American goods, how much of a market is it, and, in God's name, how much in blood and treasure has it cost to maintain it?

Mr. Chairman, during the two years immediately preceding the war with Spain this nation was at peace with all the world. Let us look back and see how much it cost during those years to maintain our military establishment.

I have here the report of the Secretary of War for the year 1897. It contains the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898. These figures simply include, Mr. Chairman, the salaries in the War Department, the pay of the Army, the cost of clothing and transportation, sustenance of the Army, and those other items which go to make up the cost of our military establishment, leaving out the moneys expended on our rivers and harbors and coast defenses, and all other items which do not properly belong to the actual expense of the Army itself.

This report shows that the entire sum of money expended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, amounted to $23,906,645.73. The amount appropriated for the support and maintenance of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, was $24,842,600.30.

It will be remembered that this appropriation was made during the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, prior to our war with Spain. The cost, therefore, of maintaining our Army during two years immediately preceding our war with Spain amounted to $48,749,246.03, making an average expenditure per annum, Mr. Chairman, of $24,374,623.

Now, let us pass over the year of our war with Spain and turn to the Secretary's annual report for the years 1900 and 1901. During these two years, Mr. Chairman, the amounts expended for maintaining and supplying the Army, including cost of transportation, leaving out all moneys expended on rivers and harbors and coast defenses, amounted to $226,006,939.15, making an average yearly expenditure of $113,003,469.57.

Subtract from this the average yearly expenditure of the two years prior to the war, and the remainder shows an annual increase of $88,628,846.56. This vast sum, Mr. Chairman, shows the amount which this nation is expending annually on its military establishment alone on account of our occupation of the Philippine Islands.

And this is not all. The Secretary of the Navy in a report made to the Senate May 23, 1902, being Senate Document 372, shows that the Navy Department expended during the years 1900 and 1901, for naval operations in the Philippines, made necessary by our occupation of those islands, the sum of $11,847,000, making an average annual expenditure of the Navy Department of $5,923,000 by reason of our being there.

This makes a total annual expenditure by this Government of $94,551,846.56. and is the annual cost of our holding the Philippine Islands.

Nor is this all, Mr. Chairman; there yet remain the pensions arising from the service of our soldiers in these tropical islands, which will continue to be a charge of millions per annum for generations to come.

There, Mr. Chairman, you have the cost, the annual outlay in money only, of the building up of our trade with the Philippines. Mr. Chairman, this is only the cost in dollars and cents. It does not include the suffering and loss of life. There are some things which can not be estimated in money. In the quiet cemetery in my home town in Nebraska there are several mounds which were decked with flowers last decoration day, mounds which were not there before our war with Spain, and mounds which would not now be there had that war not been fought. They mark the last resting place of some of the noble youth who went forth in the strength and pride of manhood's prime to battle for the liberty of Cuba.

The fortunes of war called them to the Philippine Islands and they became part of the Nebraska regiment which did such gallant service during that unfortunate war. The record they made as soldiers contains nothing of stain or reproach. They made war on no women or children; they slaughtered no unarmed prisoners. They cared kindly for all the wounded which fell into their hands; but when the balance of that company returned and were welcomed by our citizens with marching bands and flying banners, they were no longer with them, and on that occasion, Mr. Chairman, there were mothers in our town who felt the full extent of the price which had been paid, and there were fathers who realized the full measure of the sacrifice which is required when a nation calls its youth to arms.

But, Mr. Chairman, we will return to the business proposition. We are expending annually $94,551,846.56 in carrying out the Republican policy in the Philippine Islands. This immense burden has been upon the American people since the 1st day of May, 1898, a little more than four years. It is no doubt true that in the year 1898 our expenditures there were very much greater, that being the year of our war with Spain, but, to make an estimate of the entire four years and seven weeks during which time we have occupied these islands upon the same basis which it is now costing us, it may be fairly stated that the Republican policy in the Philippines has cost our people, in treasure alone, up to this time $391,714,792.89, and to this must be added the $20,000,000 which were paid to Spain for the privilege of assuming this immense burden, making $411,714,792.89.

These figures prove, Mr. Chairman, that, whether from a political or commercial standpoint, the policy of the Republican party in the Philippine Islands has proven to be the most stupendous blunder of the age.

This is the cost of keeping our flag in the Philippines, and for all this loss of blood and treasure how much trade do we enjoy?

The report of the Secretary of War for the year 1901 shows that our entire trade with the Philippine Islands during that year amounted to only $2,855,685. As a business proposition, then, Mr. Chairman, it may be safely stated that our occupation of the Philippines is not a paying investment. There may be some truth in the argument that "trade follows the flag," but whether it pays or not depends upon how much it costs to place the flag, how much to maintain it where it is placed, and how much of trade will follow it.

And so this argument too has failed. I for one, Mr. Chairman, rejoice that it is so. If any considerable number of our people have cherished the hope of building up commerce at the cost of liberty and human life, I am glad that hope has been shattered. If any of the citizens of this Republic, while they themselves were enjoying the blessings of liberty and free institutions, were willing to enslave a people in order that they might accumulate wealth by exploiting them, then I rejoice that they have been disappointed in that cruel, unholy, and unjust ambition. Whatever may be the final outcome of the present unfortunate condition in the Philippine Islands, one thing at least is sure, that long years will come and go before avarice and greed will ever again be used as an argument to move this Republic to send its conquering armies to rob a people of their liberties and place our flag by force over an unwilling race.

And what are the reasons now given, Mr. Chairman, by the majority on this floor why we should still continue in the Philippine Islands? The argument of trade has been proven false and is abandoned. But only one argument worthy of notice has been advanced by the Republicans upon this floor in support of their policy. It is urged that we have friends in these islands who welcomed us, who have recognized our authority, and who assisted us in overcoming resistance to that authority, and it is stated that there is also capital in those islands, the property of our own and foreign people, and that all these interests we are in honor bound to protect from injury, from vengeance, and from wrong, and for this reason it is stated we can not leave these islands to be governed by the inhabitants.

Mr. Chairman, if there be sufficient force and reason in this argument to require us to continue in these islands now, if it be true that we can not now in honor withdraw, then I ask at what time in the future can we hope to leave the Philippine Islands? When will we have fewer friends there to protect than now? When will we have less of property of our own and foreign people to guard? Will not these obligations rather increase than diminish in the future?

The bill which is now before the House provides for the organization of corporations to carry on all branches of business. It provides for the issuance of bonds by the Philippine government and certain of the cities of those islands. It invites the investment of capital, and in the future capital so invested in the to him, and left to his protection 3,000 or 4,000 whom the Filipino army had captured. Dewey praised his ally's patience, forbearance, and humanity. Aguinaldo told him: "I can capture Manila at once." Dewey and Anderson demurred and politely asked Aguinaldo to wait until the American troops could share the honor. Aguinaldo was acquiescent and obliging. Yes, he said, he would wait; he believed in the good faith of the Americans, and all he wanted was the independence of his country.

American transports arrived with troops—5,000, then 10,000, then 15,000, and more. Aguinaldo was requested to give them place in his line of circumvallation. He smiled and consented. Then another important thing happened; the American admiral and general on one side and the Spanish general on the other made an infamous bargain, agreeing to fight a sham battle as an excuse for the Spanish surrender of Manila. They agreed not to fire upon each other. But the Filipinos, who for more than three months had been our cordial and faithful allies, were not informed of this arrangement. They had honestly cooperated with us, had won battle after battle from the Spaniards in their front, and captured thousands of prisoners; but now, with a perfidy unexampled in history, they were left to suffer from the fire of the common enemy.

A Manila newspaper, the Diario, printed daily, comments on affairs as seen from the Spanish point of view. On July 28 it said:

> The Tagalos have been nothing but tools for the Yankees. When the end for which these tools were bought is accomplished they will be thrown aside and got rid of altogether. That is what the Yankee will do with the rebels when his interest no longer requires their aid. A kick and "I don't remember that I ever saw you."

Even Admiral Dewey, in his mistaken idea of his duty as an officer, acknowledged that he had "made use of" Aguinaldo; but he said he would "rather up anchor and steam out of the harbor" than to enter upon a crusade of conquest; and when he saw that that was the purpose of this Government he had the manliness to abandon the business and come home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Can any American who believes in justice and fair play consider the treatment which we extended to our allies without deep detestation and disgust? If this conduct was not despicable and odious, what conduct could be? If it was honorable, what conduct would be disgraceful? If, as the Republican party in its platforms and speeches has so often assured us, we are in the Philippines under the direction of Divine Providence, how much different would our conduct have been if we had been directed by the Prince of Darkness?

WHY DID WE FIRE UPON OUR ALLIES?

Having fooled and defrauded the Filipinos, to quarrel with them was easy. Having broken faith with them, to fire upon them was not difficult. We hate those whom we have abused. Our officers, with a supercilious assertion of Anglo-Saxon superiority, commanded the Filipinos to get out of Manila—for hundreds of years their capital. American officers occupied their palaces. Following the brutal example, the soldiers called the natives "niggers," "monkeys," etc., kicked them off the sidewalks as they would truant dogs, and disarmed them wherever found while permitting the defeated Spanish officers still to strut in their side arms.

From insult to outrage is but a step. A people who were despised because they were of another race from their allies could not expect to be treated as equals. Moreover, the policy of the American Government assumed more definite shape. Manila fell in the first half of August. In the last half of the following December the President issued a proclamation commanding his Army to seize the entire Philippine Archipelago and subjugate it to American arms. This was a declaration of war. It would have produced war in a single day if uttered against Great Britain, France, Germany, or even Italy or Turkey. Dewey had cabled to this country, "The people expect independence." The treaty of Paris, technically conveying the islands to the United States, was not yet ratified, so that it could not be even pretended that we had any claim whatever to the archipelago.

Our army at Manila now assumed the aggressive, pressing forward and pushing the Filipinos beyond the suburbs in spite of the repeated and pitiful appeals of Aguinaldo that peace might be preserved. These appeals were accompanied by a warning that his people would fight for their independence and would be subjugated by no nation whatever. Then came the clash—on February 4, 1899. It took place in the Santa Mesa district, outside of the boundaries of Manila, where, under the terms of the protocol, we had no right to be.

How did it happen? Republicans declare that the Filipinos began it by assaulting the American troops—that the Filipinos fired first. It has been affirmed by the brazen throat of Republican conventions. It has been repeatedly declared by President Roosevelt, by Senators LODGE, SPOONER, HAWLEY, PLATT, DEPEW, FORAKER, and by almost every Republican orator in the last campaign. It has been reiterated by them from every stump that the Filipinos opened the war by firing first upon our troops. What are the facts? I submit the following official proofs, cable dispatches from Manila to President McKinley:

February 4, 1899.—Firing upon the Filipinos and the killing of one of them by the Americans, leading to return fire. (Maj. Gen. E. S. Otis. Report up to April 6, 1899.)

February 4, 1899.—The chief insurgent leaders did not wish to open hostilities at this time. (Maj. Gen. E. S. Otis. Report up to April 6, 1899.)

The engagement was one strictly defensive on the part of the insurgents and of vigorous attack by our forces. (Major-General Otis's report, p. 96.)

FIRST SHOT IN THE WAR.

The following is an interview with W. W. Grayson, private, Nebraska Volunteers, in San Francisco, August 5, 1899:

> That night about 8 o'clock Miller and I were cautiously pacing our district. We came to a fence and were trying to see what the Filipinos were up to. Suddenly, near at hand on our left, there was a low but unmistakable Filipino outpost signal whistle. It was immediately answered by a similar whistle about 25 yards to the right. Then a red lantern flashed its signal from blockhouse No. 7. We had never seen such a sign used before. In a moment something rose slowly up not 20 feet in front of us. It was a Filipino. I yelled "Halt!" and I made it pretty loud, for I was accustomed to challenging the officer of the guard in approved military style. The man moved. Then he impudently shouted "Halto!" at me.
> Well, I thought the best thing to do was to shoot him. He dropped. If I did not kill him I guess he died of fright. Then two Filipinos sprang out of the gateway, about 15 feet from us. I called, "Halt," and Miller fired, and dropped one. I saw that another was left. Well, I think I got my second Filipino that time. We retreated to where our six other fellows were, and I said: "Line up, fellows; the niggers are in here all through these yards." We then retreated to the pipe line and stayed behind the water main all night. It was some minutes after our second shots before the Filipinos began firing.

Brig. Gen. C. McC. Reeve, on duty in Manila at the time, said in an interview in Minneapolis on April 24, 1899:

> I can tell you one piece of news that is not generally known in the United States. On Sunday, February 5, the day after the fighting began, General Torres, of the insurgents, came through our lines under a flag of truce and had a personal interview with General Otis, in which, speaking for Aguinaldo, he declared that the fighting had been begun accidentally and was not authorized by Aguinaldo; that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and that to bring about a conclusion of hostilities he proposed the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies of any width that would be agreeable to General Otis, so that during the peace negotiations there might be no further danger of conflicts between the two armies. To these representations of General Torres General Otis sternly replied that the fighting having once begun must go on to the grim end.

This is substantiated by the telegram of General Otis, sent during the next week, as follows:

> Aguinaldo now applies for a cessation of hostilities and conference; have declined to answer.

The following is Aguinaldo's view of the situation, as stated in his order to the Filipino army:

> The American forces, without prior notification or any just motive, attacked our camp at San Juan del Monte and our forces garrisoning the blockhouses round the outskirts of Manila. * * * No one can deplore more than I this outbreak of hostilities. I have a clear conscience that I have endeavored to avoid it at all cost, using all my efforts to preserve friendship with the army of occupation, even at the cost of not a few humiliations and many sacrificed rights. * * * I call on God as a witness of my good faith and the uprightness of my intentions.
> EMILIO AGUINALDO,

This order of Aguinaldo is contained in General Otis's report, page 95.

Of this battle of February 4–5, General Otis reports (p. 99):

> Our casualties for the day in killed and wounded numbered about 250. Those of the insurgents will never be known. Our hospitals were filled with their wounded, our prisons with their captured, and we buried 700 of them. Their loss was estimated at 3,000, and, considering the number who died on the field of battle, might be deemed conservative.

Is there a man in the Congress of the United States who is proud of that summary? Is there a man in America whose senses have not been stupefied by blood who will declare that battle an honor to the American flag? General Hughes in his testimony before the Philippine Committee affirmed that he felt as if he were fighting children.

I repeat the question, What respectful language can we use toward those Republicans who reiterate in face of these official reports that the Filipinos fired the first shot and began the fighting?

The Filipinos were on the defensive, as General Otis had reported to Washington, but after they were thus treacherously and brutally attacked they fought as well as they could. They were fighting for independence; this they repeatedly declared through Aguinaldo and other leaders at every opportunity. They made it so clear that it was independence they were fighting for that they left no excuse for anybody to deny it or misunderstand it. Of course they fought at every disadvantage. In fighting ability they were far inferior to the Americans, and they had no machine guns or other of the most modern implements of warfare. Therefore it was that in the first battle they lost something like 15 men for every 1 of the Americans killed or wounded.

This inferiority in battle may cause the thoughtless and heartless to jeer, but their persistence in fighting for the right to govern themselves should evoke other feelings than scorn in the Philippines, held by our own and citizens of other countries, will urge their claims to our protection with a stronger voice, and clamor more loudly than ever, that in honor we must not leave their interests unprotected in these islands; but that we must continue to hold down these people by force of arms. We must continue to spend millions of dollars annually to maintain an army there. We must continue to send the flower of our youth to these tropical islands, in order that foreign investors, seeking only worldly gain, may continue to exploit this unfortunate people.

An argument such as this, Mr. Chairman, would mean that the time will never come when we can withdraw our forces from these islands. It would mean that the reasons which prevent us now from granting these people their independence would become stronger with each passing year, and that at no time could we hope to withdraw our jurisdiction and leave these people in liberty and peace. I deny that any such condition exists. If this nation is strong enough to hold down an entire people, it is strong enough to enforce an agreement providing for the protection of all who are entitled in honor to look to us for protection in the Philippine Islands.

The policy of the Republican party as disclosed in the bill now offered us requires our continued stay in the Philippine Islands. The substitute offered by the minority provides for the establishment of a government in the Philippines and the granting to them of independence, and so with these two measures presented the issue is joined. You, being in the majority, will pass this bill, and it will become a law, and with the passage of this measure the record is made.

The Republican policy of imperialism is declared, and in a few days we will go before the country to learn whether the record which you have made, whether the policy which you here advocate, is approved by the American people.

The question of the liberty and independence of the Filipinos is not alone for the courts and Congress to determine. That question must be settled by the great voice of the American people.

To your policy we are unalterably opposed. On this issue you meet a united Democracy. We hold you responsible for the millions of treasure you have wasted; for all the millions you are still to waste; for all the lives you have sacrificed; for all the youth that has been shattered; for all the gibbering insane which you have brought from the Orient; for all the cruelty, shame, misery, and suffering resulting from your Philippine policy. You are responsible for it all.

You stand for imperialism, with all it implies. We stand for the eternal principles of liberty and justice; for the principles upon which this nation was founded; for the right of a people to govern themselves; for the Declaration of Independence as it is written, and for political freedom and liberty everywhere under the flag of this great Republic. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There are no other speakers prepared to speak on this side to-night. I desire to give notice to those who are on the list that they must be here to-morrow in the daytime and then come here in the evening session or some of them will not have an opportunity to address the committee at all. A good many have gone away and will not return until Monday or Tuesday, and some of them it will be impossible to hear. I want this understood, that gentlemen must be here to-morrow in order that they may have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the Philippine Archipelago is ours. This fact may as well be admitted and, indeed, asserted. It is ours by force, and this establishes the proprietary relation, whether it is ours by right or not.

The principal question before this Congress is, "What shall we do with this piece of property?" The answer to this question depends upon several important considerations. First, How did we come by it? Second, Is it worth keeping?

In trying to arrive at an answer to the problem before us, I shall discuss the preliminary questions: How came we at war with Spain? When did fighting between us and the Filipinos begin? Was it their fault or ours? Whose fault was it that it continued? Is it probable that the Filipinos desire to be our subjects?

HOW DID THE WAR WITH SPAIN BEGIN?

For three years the opinion prevailed throughout the United States, without distinction of party, that the last Republican Administration had done all in its power to prevent our war with Spain. Its head was looked upon as the great champion of peace, and his friends insisted that he was driven into the war by the obstinacy and hostle attitude of the Spanish dynasty. The time has come to reveal the actual facts in the case. This is now possible, for the letters and dispatches of Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, our minister to Madrid, after having been suppressed for three years, in violation of comity and decency, if not of law, have at last been extorted from the American Secretary of State. These dispatches show beyond any doubt that John Sherman, then Secretary of State, and General Woodford made a most earnest and patriotic effort to prevent the war, and that their efforts were brought to naught by their being arbitrarily overruled. General Woodford was superseded in recognition of his efforts to preserve the peace, and John Sherman, superseded by Day, went down to his grave, embittered by his treatment and bemoaning the war which had resulted.

In proof of this I quote briefly from these long-suppressed dispatches. General Woodford communicated daily with Washington. For weeks he insisted every day that Spain did not want war; that she knew she would be beaten if there were war, and that she would do everything self-respect would permit to avert war. On March 19, 1898, he telegraphed to the President:

If you will acquaint me fully with general settlement desired, I believe Spanish Government will offer without compulsion such terms as may be satisfactory to both nations.

Seven days later Secretary Day telegraphed to Woodford:

See if following can be done: First, armistice until October 1. Negotiations meantime looking for peace between Spain and insurgents through friendly offices President United States. Second, immediate revocation of reconcentrado order.

Within three days the reconcentrado order was revoked by Spain. On April 5 the Queen of Spain offered in return for peace to issue the following humiliating proclamation:

At the request of the Holy Father in this passion week and in the name of Christ, I proclaim immediate and unconditional suspension of hostilities in the island of Cuba * * * for the space of six months. I pray the blessing of heaven upon this truce of God, which I now declare in His name and with the sanction of the Holy Father of all Christendom.

Could the Queen have gone further without sacrificing all self-respect? What did Secretary Day do with this magnanimous offer? He made no answer to it. He pigeonholed it for six days. Woodford telegraphed to him:

If this be secured, I believe you will get final settlement before August 1 on one of the following bases: Either such autonomy as the insurgents may agree to accept, or recognition by Spain of the independence of the island, or cession of the island to the United States. I hope that nothing will now be done to humiliate Spain.

In the face of all this the President launched his war message at Congress the very next day. Everything indicates that he had resolved to have war and not to accept any concessions whatever from Spain at least six weeks before this time. All these dispatches were pitched into the pigeonhole, and the American people were deceived by some one. The afrit of war was released and pandemonium has since prevailed. The necessity for the Spanish war will still be discussed, but it will no longer be truthfully denied that it was begun under false pretenses.

With all this diplomatic correspondence in hand, and knowing exactly what the truth was, the Republican convention of Ohio, on May 28 last, declared in its platform that "the war with Spain was forced on us against our will." What can be said of such an assertion? How can it be characterized in language which would be considered parliamentary?

WERE THE FILIPINOS OUR ALLIES?

The war with Spain was immediately punctuated by two great events—the destruction of the Spanish fleet in the bay of Manila by Admiral George Dewey and the destruction of the sister fleet off Santiago by Admiral Winfield Scott Schley. From a military point of view these were magnificent performances, and they were followed by tremendous consequences.

Dewey, before leaving Hongkong for Manila, had sent an appeal to Aguinaldo, general in chief of the Filipino forces, to come from Singapore and help him, in accordance with the generous promise of the Philippine republic a year before. Aguinaldo responded at once, and carried with him a proclamation to the Filipino people containing the following declaration and injunctions:

COMPATRIOTS: Divine Providence is about to place independence within our reach, and in a way the most free and independent nation could hardly wish for. The Americans, not from mercenary motives, but for the sake of humanity and the lamentations of so many persecuted people, have considered it opportune to extend their protecting mantle to our beloved country. * * * Rather die than be ungrateful to our American liberators. * * * Where you see the American flag flying, assemble in numbers. They are our redeemers.

Dewey received Aguinaldo as an ally in accordance with this pathetic manifesto. Aguinaldo cordially responded. He went ashore to organize his people and recall his soldiers to arms, for there were no American soldiers within 7,000 miles. He succeeded in his mission. He organized an army of 35,000 men, paid for arming them with the very money he has been accused of appropriating to his own use, and built a line of breastworks 8 miles long, entirely encompassing the city of Manila. Dewey encouraged him; praised him; telegraphed to Washington, "Aguinaldo has done wonders;" delivered hundreds of Spanish prisoners breasts of all men who love liberty and remember American history.

Our present relation to the Filipinos is undoubtedly warlike; yet in a technical and legal sense war does not exist. The Constitution of the United States denies to the President the right to make war by limiting that function wholly to the action of Congress. Congress declared war against Spain, but that war came to an official end on February 14, 1899. For more than two years now we have been fighting in the Philippine Islands for the purpose of subjugating to our rule 10,000,000 people who never owed or pretended to owe us allegiance, but this the President calls an insurrection, and the men who are fighting for their liberty he calls "insurgents."

THE TORTURES WERE FORESEEN.

The result might have been foretold. Wherever on the earth a superior nation comes in hostile contact with an inferior there is always something more than battles resulting. The conceit, superciliousness, and insolence of the superior race beget conduct on both sides forbidden by the rules of civilized warfare. The representatives of France, Germany, England, Japan, and the United States were in China only a few months, but wholesale looting, arson, murder, and torture had already begun when the armies were called home none too soon. Hostility between the white races of the north and the brown races of the Tropics and the Orient always result in the barbarization of the whites.

The numerous cases and ingenious methods of torture of which our soldiers in the Philippines have been guilty might well stagger the credulity of the country, if such abundant corroboration were not at hand. Hardly any atrocity that has ever been perpetrated by the American Indians in their most ferocious mood is lacking in the official reports from Manila. The most horrible tortures have been resorted to, not in retaliation after the manner of the American Indian, but without that excuse, merely for the purpose of compelling the victim to divulge secrets of which he is suspected of being possessed.

Some of these cases are disgusting and sickening in their details. One of the commonest is the so-called water-cure torture, which seems to have been resorted to by every regiment at a distance from Manila. In this the victim is thrown upon his back, held down, his mouth pried open with a bayonet, and water poured into him by the gallon until the suffering is too great to bear. If he does not yield a soldier is detailed to jump on his body and force the water out when the process is repeated. When these debasing and terrifying atrocities are denounced the Republican party interposes with its protest and charges us with abusing the Army!

We are not abusing the Army. The exact contrary is true. We are defending the Army. A good many officers and soldiers in the Army are not guilty. It is in their behalf that we call attention to the terrible crimes committed by their unworthy comrades. When burglars are arrested, is it an assault upon the community? When a murderer is tracked and captured, are the police who capture him to be charged with abusing the law-abiding among whom he lived? Of course not. They are defending that community. Why, then, are we charged with slandering the Army because we call attention to the crimes which some officers and some soldiers by their order commit in the Philippines? We do not claim that the whole Army is guilty of these hideous excesses. We denounce only the men who are guilty, and we declare the rest to be innocent.

Who is slandering the Army? They who defend torture and merciless inhumanity as the work of the entire Army, confounding the innocent with the guilty, or we who discriminate between the decent soldier and the vile wretches who perpetrate anew the enormities of Spain in the sixteenth century?

These grewsome practices are admitted. There is proof of thousands of cases of the water-cure torture administered to extort confession. General Funston shamelessly declared in his Chicago speech: "Sometimes we have extorted information by force," and on receiving the proofs that Major Waller had shot eleven unarmed prisoners and burnt "all the villages and houses in his line of march," he exclaimed, "Bully for Waller!" And Gen. Jacob H. Smith declares "Major Waller carried out my wishes and instructions loyally and gallantly."

Through his counsel a colonel in the Army, General Smith, has admitted to the court which tried him in Manila:

That he issued orders to Major Waller to kill the natives and burn their homes.

That he issued orders to make Samar (an island of 300,000 people) a "howling wilderness."

That he ordered all persons capable of bearing arms to be killed.

That he ordered this ruthless killing specifically to include all above 10 years of age.

In harmony with this infamy General Bell established reconcentrado camps, ordered everybody to come within "the life line," and threatened all others with death. He issued an order to his soldiers to so prosecute the war "as to make the people want peace and want it badly," and he authorized them to "do anything and take any action which will contribute to the end in view." Any action! And this same General Bell is a member of the court that is trying Smith.

General Hughes has testified before the Senate Philippines Committee that he issued orders that if his troops were fired on in any town or village it would be burned; and when asked if such punishment would not fall mainly on women and children, he replied: "They are a part of the family; you can punish the man probably worse in that way than any other." The testimony of a soldier that a treacherous native guide was buried by his regiment up to the neck and that his face was then smeared with molasses and he was left for the great white ants to eat, should be either denounced or applauded by the defenders of our present Philippine policy.

In the face of hundreds of pages of proof that these atrocities have been and are being committed by American soldiers, the President of the United States, selecting Memorial Day for his speech, with shocking inappropriateness, affirmed that "the fact really is that our warfare in the Philippines has been carried on with singular humanity!" He said, further, there have been some cruelties, "but;" they must be exposed, "but;" inhumanities should not be indulged in by American troops, "but;" tortures are not justifiable, "but." Yes, the President of the United States summoned to his aid fourteen "buts" [laughter] in these paragraphs of his speech, and he employed them solely for the purpose of extenuating and excusing the crimes he condemned.

In this remarkable Memorial Day address the President finds the occasion a proper one for stirring up anew sectional animosities, recalling that Grant was sometimes called a "butcher" and the Union Army designated as "Lincoln's hirelings." If he had added all the opprobrious epithets which some of the Union men bestowed upon the Confederate President and army, he would have succeeded in doing all that could be done on an occasion of amity and good feeling to kindle anew sectional hostility and hate. If the party that elected him Vice-President thinks his utterance on Memorial Day well timed and discreet, the objects of his spleen will probably be able to survive it.

THE PARTY IS TO BLAME, NOT THE SOLDIERS.

The fact is that the chief blame for the atrocities in the Philippines does not properly fall upon the soldiers whose hands perpetrated them. The chief responsibility for all the outrages perpetrated by Americans upon the Filipinos or by the Filipinos upon Americans will forever rest upon the Administration which adopted the wretched policy of subjugation and sent an army to deprive a free people of their liberties.

Here rests the censure and the condemnation. It can not be shirked. They knew that such a scheme of rapacity made necessary all the excesses of barbarian warfare. They knew that the English army in India, the German army in West Africa, the French army in Madagascar, the Italian army in Abyssinia, and even the army sent to maintain the mild authority of Holland in Java, in aggressive warfare to deprive people of their rights and reconstruct their morals, religion, and social policy, had encountered these same insurmountable difficulties and had resorted to these same hideous practices. They knew it; for, as the great Senator from Massachusetts has just said in the Senate, "Men are held to know what they ought to know in morals and in the conduct of states." [Applause on Democratic side.]

They knew, therefore, that the Malays are not expected to fight according to civilized methods, and that their enemies are sure to make the Malayan method more bloody and more revolting. This has always been the case.

Gen. Jacob Smith finds a fitting prototype in Rajah James Brooke, of Sarawak, who received from England $100,000 for killing a large number of the natives, or, as Smith puts it, "pacifying" them, and who reduced to abject slavery all who submitted to him. Conditions in Sumatra, where the Dutch have been endeavoring to subjugate the natives for hundreds of years, are thus described by an officer of the United States Geological Survey who recently traveled there:

In 1873 the Dutch Government declared war with the Achinese inhabiting the northern part of the island of Sumatra. The Achinese are very much like the Tagalos of Luzon in being of pure Malay stock and the most civilized of all the Sumatran tribes. * * * The reason why this war has been so long drawn out is that, as in the Philippines, the Dutch have been unable to draw the Achinese out into the open for a decisive engagement. The fighting is carried on in the jungles and consists of surprises, ambuscades, etc. * * * The Dutch fight the natives in squads and the war is one of extermination, no quarter being given to those who fall into the hands of the Hollanders.

One thing that the Dutch have discovered in their two centuries of rule in Sumatra is that there is no such thing as making the natives satisfied with their form of government. The Dutch have been in possession of Sumatra since the seventeenth century, yet in all that time the natives have never let an opportunity pass to attempt regaining their independence. The slightest concession, relaxation of rigor, or kindness on the part of the Dutch is interpreted by the Malays as a symptom of weakness, and is made the signal for a general uprising and butchery of the whites.

Thus it is everywhere in efforts to subjugate. England's rule in India has been established and maintained by treachery, perjury, forgery, wholesale lying, and torture of every kind known to barbarians, and the ryots of India have to pay for this rule of aliens not only in money won by the hardest of labor, but they have to pay for it in lives laid down—sometimes a million of the poorest people perishing of famine in a single year. I say the Republicans knew all these things when they deliberately resolved to subjugate the Philippine Islands and destroy the liberties of their people.

I say that the Republicans knew also that the great nations which have subjugated tropical peoples have been obliged to resort to "enforced labor," another name for slavery, in order to get labor performed. Imperialists all over the world are in favor of this slavery, and if we succeed in subjugating and holding the Philippine Islands the people that are left after our machine guns have got through with them will be reduced to slavery.

WILL IT PAY TO GO ON?

How are we going to make this oriental enterprise pay if we persist in it?

It has cost the lives of 10,000 Americans and at least 150,000 Filipinos. How much has it cost in money? In respone to a resolution of the Senate, the Secretary of War reported to-day that the entire cost had been $170,000,000. The curious bookkeeping by which this result was reached can not be justified, but even this sum is stupendous in comparison to results accomplished.

What would this vast sum, disbursed only for evil, have done for Americans if it had been expended upon our own soil?

What would it have done for religion?

It would have erected a new church in every town of America.

What would it have done for education?

It would have built a schoolhouse in every town.

What would it have done for the comfort of farmers?

It would have bought a new mowing machine for every haygrower and a new sewing machine for every farmer's wife in America.

What would it have done for agricultural progress?

It would have irrigated the great central West, constructing retaining reservoirs at the head of every river, sending water in spacious aqueducts through the thirsty valleys, and carrying luxuriance to half a million new-made farms.

What would it have done for commerce?

It would have constructed the isthmian canal for vessels of the largest size, or would have enlarged the Erie Canal to carry ocean greyhounds to Chicago, and would have begun and finished a ship canal connecting Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River, and constructed an inland waterway from Boston to Beaufort Inlet, North Carolina.

What would this vast sum, diverted from the Philippine Islands, where it has been worse than wasted, have done for travel?

It would have built a superb Appian Way, a hundred feet wide, as smooth and hard as crystal, from Boston to San Francisco, with lateral branches to Montreal and Florida, to Manitoba and Texas.

What profits are in sight from our Quixotic venture? We are beaten to-day by all the other great nations in trade with the Philippines. We have sown there the seeds of inextinguishable hatred. How are we going to trade with a country which we have depopulated and impoverished? If our trade with the Philippine Islands last year had returned to us a profit of 50 per cent, it would take a thousand years for us to get back the money we have already expended.

How shall we get out of the scrape we have gotten into?

There is but one way: We must acknowledge our error in manly fashion; give up our insane thirst for dominion; promise independence to the Filipinos on honorable terms that self-respecting men can accept—such terms as are offered to them in our minority bill.

Who favors this policy? All Democrats, with Grover Cleveland and William Jennings Bryan at their head. All Populists favor it. All of the most distinguished Republicans of the last decade; Benjamin Harrison and John Sherman favored it, and died advocating it. Governor Boutwell, Judge Edmunds, Carl Schurz—all members of Republican cabinets—Andrew Carnegie, Thomas B. Reed, Senator HOAR—all are aligned as champions of this humane and enlightened policy. And the Philippine Commission appointed by President McKinley—Dewey, Schurman, and Denby, three members out of the five, have boldly repudiated this destructive policy of the Republican party.

Shall we continue to impoverish ourselves and send our sons to death, or to diseases worse than death, merely for the gratification of our vanity? Let us stand by our ideals; let us vindicate the Declaration of Independence; let us keep our promise to our allies—a promise made, if not in formal language, at least by our principles, by our unambiguous acts, by our bill of rights, by our entire history. Let us substitute for our flag the flag of self-government in the Eastern seas, make friends of those who are now our foes, and anchor a young republic off the coast of China. Could any deed bring greater joy or confer greater honor upon our Government? Would it not be an achievement to be proud of?

Our treachery to the Filipinos after they had fought by our side as our allies, and Funston's perfidious capture of the Filipino general are worthy of the base and infamous Themistocles, whose conduct all readers of history will recall. After the navies of Athens, Sparta, and the other Greek States had been for years fighting side by side against Persia, the aggressive enemy of all, Themistocles proclaimed that he had devised a plan greatly to the advantage of Athens, but could not disclose it in a public assembly.

The convocation thereupon appointed the wise and humane Aristides as its representative, and agreed to abide by his decision as to the adoption of the scheme. The two leaders consulted. Aristides listened, and at once reported to the assembly that nothing could be more advantageous to Athens than the plan of Themistocles, and nothing could be more wicked and unjust. Thereupon it was immediately rejected. When ultimately revealed, it became known that the ingenious project was to secure the naval supremacy of Athens by clandestinely burning the navies of all the other Greek States, her faithful allies. The proposal was declared to be infamous, and Themistocles was banished for life to the realms of Xerxes.

Aristides was surnamed or nicknamed "the Just." It does not seem to have occurred to him that everything is honorable in war. He scorned to betray his allies, showing a sensitiveness that would have been sneered at if exhibited in the present Congress of the United States. He declared that it would be infamous for Athens to sink a single trireme that had fought in her cause. Aristides was crowned with honor by Athenians, and he died enfolded in their grateful love.

History has bestowed upon him her laurels. We are told that there was one man in Athens who was terribly fatigued and irritated whenever the name of the great hero and patriot was mentioned. He said he was tired to death hearing Aristides called "the Just." It is the same to-day. The cause of liberty is as fatiguing to some ears as was the honored name which Athens bestowed on Aristides. They are tired of it—tired to death hearing about it. It provokes them. It irritates them. It even exasperates them. They stop their ears. They beg us not to mention it any more; and when somebody on this side of the Chamber extols the name and cause of freedom, they wildly wring their hands and tragically pull their hair, and cry out "Don't! Spare us! Don't mention it again! We have heard it all before! It is the same old speech! We are tired of hearing about it!" There is one thing which gentlemen can do to effectually seal our lips and put an end to the tiresome demand—let them enact justice into law and establish freedom in the Philippines. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CURRIER, having resumed the chair, Mr. KYLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2295, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia (at 9 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15068) providing for the resurvey of certain townships in San Diego County, State of California, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2606); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims; to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14357) for the relief of Paymaster James E. Tolfree, United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2607); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14358) for the relief of Pay Clerk Charles Blake, United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2608); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GRAFF, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1672) for the relief of Elisha A. Goodwin, executor of the estate of Alexander W. Goodwin, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2609); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13608) granting an increase of pension to Elvira M. Cooper, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. MAHON: A bill (H. R. 15200) to provide relief for personal injuries sustained by the destruction of the United States battle ship Maine—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CURTIS: A bill (H. R. 15201) to allot the lands of the Cherokee tribe of Indians in Indian Territory, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ESCH: A bill (H. R. 15202) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved April 12, 1900—to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

By Mr. PUGSLEY (by request): A bill (H. R. 15203) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JENKINS (by request): A bill (H. R. 15204) for the extension of Maryland avenue east of Fifteenth street to M street northeast—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GRAFF: A bill (H. R. 15205) granting a pension to Henry G. McKinley—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HENDERSON: A bill (H. R. 15206) granting a pension to Mary P. Everton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOY: A bill (H. R. 15207) to permit W. W. Wheeler to prosecute a claim—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCULLOCH: A bill (H. R. 15208) for the relief of James H. Rodgers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MAYNARD: A bill (H. R. 15209) for the relief of George W. Wood—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RANDELL of Texas: A bill (H. R. 15210) for the relief of Gertrude O'Bannon—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: A bill (H. R. 15211) granting a pension to Mary J. Slusser—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAMS: Resolutions of the Trades League of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring a bill to increase the efficiency of the foreign service, etc.—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BABCOCK: Petition of druggists of Platteville, Wis., for the passage of House bill 178, reducing the tax on alcohol—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BINGHAM: Resolution of the Trades' League of Philadelphia in favor of bill for the reorganization of the consular service, etc.—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania (by request): Petition of 7 druggists of Phoenixville, Pa., for reduction of the tax on alcohol—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GRAHAM: Petition of Theodore J. Frank and 5 other druggists of Allegheny, Pa., in favor of House bill 178, for the reduction of the tax on alcohol—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolutions of the Trades' League of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring a bill to increase the efficiency of the foreign service of the United States, and to provide for the reorganization of the consular service—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HANBURY: Papers to accompany House bill 14721, to correct the military record of Michael Keegan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HEMENWAY: Petition of W. H. Fogas, of Evansville, Ind., urging the reduction of the tax on alcohol—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LOVERING: Resolutions of the selectmen of the towns of Middleboro and Plymouth, Mass., for increase of pay of letter carriers—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. MAYNARD: Papers to accompany House bill for the relief of George W. Wood—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. McCLELLAN: Petition of citizens of the Twelfth Congressional district of New York in favor of House bill No. 12203—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PUGSLEY (by request): Petition and papers to accompany House bill 15203, relating to an isthmian canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH: Petition of W. A. Hayes and other citizens of Rochester, Mich., in behalf of Prof. Theodore Munger, who claims to have discovered some new scientific facts regarding the earth—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SHALLENBERGER: Petition of William J. Murphy and 125 other inmates of the Soldiers and Sailors' Home at Grand Island, Nebr., favoring a pension of $30 per month to all veterans over 30 years of age—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 21, 1902.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as Speaker pro tempore for this day, Mr. CURRIER.

E. G. JOHNSON.

Mr. HILDEBRANT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Accounts, I call up House resolution 288, and I ask that the substitute reported by the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to pay to E. G. Johnson out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $200 for services in caring for and regulating the House chronometer during the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses.

The substitute resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HILDEBRANT. I also call up, Mr. Speaker, House resolution 307.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, under the direction of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, the sum of $250, for additional clerical services rendered said committee in the discharge of the duties imposed by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 3, 1902, with respect to the employment, compensation, and duties of employees of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was agreed to.

STENOGRAPHER IN THE OFFICE OF THE JOURNAL CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HILDEBRANT. I also, by direction of the committee, Mr. Speaker, call up House resolution 310.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the employment of a stenographer in the office of the Journal clerk of the House is hereby authorized for the remainder of the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, the compensation of said stenographer to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $100 a month.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand it to be true that these three resolutions have been unanimously reported from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit me, I will say that the three resolutions just read were agreed to by the Committee on Accounts and that the minority of the committee was fully represented, and the resolutions were unanimously reported.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HILDEBRANT, a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the three resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take up the sundry civil conference report and dispose of it. I suppose on one item at least, from what I understood yesterday in the debate on the floor, that the House will be asked to act on the question of a memorial bridge. There is evidently not a quorum present now, and I would be glad to give notice that at half past 12 o'clock to-day I will test the sense of the committee on a motion to rise for the purpose of making that report. I would do it now except that we can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. At what time did the gentleman say?

Mr. CANNON. At half past 12, if that is satisfactory to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. RIXEY. That is satisfactory to me.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Military Academy bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement only be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, calls up conference report on the Military Academy bill, and asks unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with and that the statement only be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the conference report is signed by the three conferees?

Mr. HULL. It is a unanimous report on both sides.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the statement will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

The conferees on the part of the House submit the following statement on the action of the conference committee of the two Houses on H. R. 13676, "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903:"

Amendment No. 1 provides for traveling expenses of cadets admitted to the Academy from their homes to the Academy, and also increases the number of cadets at large by the addition of 10, making a total number of 40 to be appointed from the country at large.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment, and agrees to the same with an amendment providing that the total number of cadets appointed at large shall not exceed 40.

The agreement to the payment of actual traveling expenses was for the reason that since 1883 cadets at the Naval Academy have been allowed their expenses from their homes to the Academy, and for the further reason that it equalizes the expenses of the cadets by placing those living at a distance from the Academy on an exact equality with those living near the Academy.

No. 2 is simply a verbal amendment, and the House recedes.

No. 3 is simply an addition of the totals for three enlisted men, without changing the amount appropriated, and the House recedes.

Nos. 4 and 5 simply strike out quotation marks, which should never have been in the bill, and the House recedes.

No. 6 makes specific appropriation for athletic supplies, and the House recedes.

Nos. 7 and 10 simply refer to lights and strike out words which have been in the bill heretofore in regard to the Welsbach burner that are now considered surplusage, and the House recedes on both.

No. 8 relates to gauges for the water supply from two places only; and as the third place is added by another amendment later on, the House recedes.

No. 9 simply strikes out the brackets around certain words, and the House recedes.

No. 11 makes specific the power to provide for an increased water supply, and the House recedes.

No. 12 makes more specific the power under the bill to install the heating and lighting plant, and the House recedes.

No. 13 increases the appropriation $1,000,000, and the Senate recedes.

No. 14 relates to supervising architects and also to the purchase of the island commonly known as Constitution Island. The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment, and agrees to the same with the amendment which provides that no architect shall be employed after plans are approved, except that the Secretary of War may have a consulting architect, at a compensation not exceeding $5,000 a year. This entirely eliminates the purchase of the island, as provided for in the Senate amendment.

J. A. T. HULL,
RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask what changes this makes in reference to the number of cadets?

Mr. HULL. It adds 10 to those that the President may appoint at large. The Senate provision added 10 a year, and provided that the number should be 40. We struck out the provision that 10 should be added a year, and simply provided that it should not exceed the number of 40, for the reason that 10 a year might not reach the number apportioned. For instance, some failing one year could not be reappointed the next under the limitation of 10 a year.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman as to the provision about equalizing the pay for travel of cadets living at a long or a short distance from the Academy.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, an effort has been made for some years to have the provisions applying to the Naval Academy in regard to paying the expenses of cadets applied to the Military Academy.

The Senate inserted a provision in this bill, and the House conferees, after discussion, agreed to it for two reasons. One is, it places the cadet at West Point on an equality with the cadet at Annapolis, and the other is that if the Government pays the expenses it equalizes the cost of education of the different cadets. In other words, a cadet appointed from New York only has to pay a dollar or two to get to West Point, while a cadet from California or in the Western or Middle States of the country coming to the Eastern borders of the country has to pay out a large amount of money for expenses. Sometimes this is a great hardship to the cadet living at a distance. It places the two academies on the same equality, and equalizes the amount paid by those living close to the Academy and those living in remote parts.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me another question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The President now has under the law 20 appointments?

Mr. HULL. He has 30.

Mr. BARTLETT. And it is proposed to give him 10 more, making the number 40 in all?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. But it does not increase the number allowed to the Senator or Representative?

Mr. HULL. Not at all. It only replaces the President in this respect where he was some years ago—giving him the appointment of 40 cadets at large. In the first instance, the President appointed all the cadets; but under the present rule the cadets for the States and districts are appointed on the recommendation of Senators and Representatives, and at large are appointed by him without reference to the recommendation of anybody. These appointments, both for Annapolis and West Point, are given to the President for the purpose of providing for the sons of officers of the Army and Navy who have no Representative and are not bona fide representatives of any district. As to cadets appointed by members of the Senate and House of Representatives, the Representative or Senator making the nomination is required to certify that the cadet named is a bona fide resident of his district, or in the case of a Senator, of his State. In regard to residence, the President is not limited; he can appoint cadets from any locality. But the idea is to give him the means of providing for a class of people who would not otherwise be provided for.

Mr. MANN. How large an increase in the number of cadets was made in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. HULL. One hundred—90 for Senators and 10 for the President.

Mr. MANN. The President before that time had 20 appointments?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. And now the proposition is to give him 40?

Mr. HULL. Years ago the President had 40 appointments; then we took away 20, leaving him 20; then, one year ago, we increased the number to 30, and now it is proposed to restore the number to 40.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, there will be an increased number of appointments by reason of the increase in the number of members of the House—an increase to the extent of 30 or 40.

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir. As the number of Representatives increases there is a corresponding increase in the number of cadets.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the proposition to increase by 10 the number of cadets to be appointed by the President was not voted down in the Military Committee when it was under consideration there?

Mr. HULL. It was.

Mr. CLAYTON. And the proposition is now to take the Senate amendment. I understand this is a Senate amendment.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Can the gentleman tell us when this business of increasing the number of cadets at the Naval Academy and at the Military Academy is to end?

Mr. HULL. Whenever Congress wants it to end; but I should say——

Mr. CLAYTON. Are we to be committed to a policy of continually increasing the number of appointments of cadets by the President?

Mr. HULL. So far as that is concerned, the next Congress can cut down the number, if it wants to——

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope it will.

Mr. HULL. Or increase the number, if it wants to.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does not the gentleman think we ought to begin the pruning process right now?

Mr. HULL. No; I do not.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do.

Mr. HULL. We went into conference on this bill with three important matters before the committee. This was one, if it can be called one. Another was the increase of $1,000,000 in the appropriation for permanent buildings. Another was the proposed purchase of Constitution Island, without any limitation as to price, that provision having been put on by the Senate. The only three parts of the bill that were in controversy at all were these three that I have just named. The House conferees succeeded in having the million-dollar appropriation for buildings struck off. They succeeded in eliminating the provision for the purchase of Constitution Island. And the only thing of any consequence whatever that had been put on by the Senate that we did not succeed in having struck out was this one proposition.

I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that the Committee on Military Affairs did not express themselves as absolutely opposed to any increase in this matter, but they believed they had better let it go over. I think this conference report is as substantial a victory for the contention of the House on this bill as has ever been secured by the House on any appropriation bill.

Mr. HAY. Is it not a fact that the Army has been decreased since this bill came up by 12,000 men?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia knows that that is not a fair statement in regard to this cadet business.

Mr. HAY. Well, you are increasing the number of officers of the Army and decreasing the Army. Now, why increase the number of officers and thereby have officers with no men for them to command?

Mr. HULL. That I am not willing to concede at all. But I will say that the bill as passed by Congress and approved by the President, and now the law, did give the President the power to decrease the enlisted force, but not the commissioned force.

Mr. HAY. Exactly.

Mr. HULL. But the President has no power under the law to decrease the officers of the Army. He can only deal, under the law, with the enlisted force.

Mr. HAY. I know he has not, but the gentleman is now advocating a policy of increase or advocating an increase of the officers.

Mr. PARKER. No, no.

Mr. HULL. No, I am not. This does not do anything to increase officers of the Army; it simply provides for ten more cadets.

Mr. HAY. Well, will they not become officers?

Mr. HULL. They may or may not, owing to whether there are vacancies.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question now, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. HULL. Wait until I answer the gentleman from Virginia. In accordance with the purpose of the committee of the House and of the Senate, we have proposed to largely increase the Academy at West Point. We have increased its professors, we are increasing its buildings, we are multiplying its powers to educate, and there are large numbers of people in the United States not in the Army, in the National Guard, and those that have given attention to this matter, who rejoice in the fact that at the small expense required to educate these young men it is going to be accomplished, and they are glad to have a full complement educated there for the benefit of the country as a whole, whether they serve in the Army or not.

Mr. STEELE. Whether they become officers or not?

Mr. HULL. Whether they become officers or not.

Mr. HAY. Your policy is to educate these young men, not for the Army, but for the country at large?

Mr. HULL. No; I do not believe that this number will go beyond the requirements of the Army, and will not fill all the vacancies in the Army.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if it takes the same number of officers to officer, say, 85,000 men, as to officer 66,000 men?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, that is not before the House, but I will answer the gentleman. If the organizations are preserved, it does; if the organizations are abolished, it does not. But if you have 12 companies in a regiment with 40 men you need the same officers that you have if you have them at a hundred men, if you have the 12 companies and preserve the organization. That was the idea of Congress when they passed the bill to reorganize the Army, so that in time of war, without waiting to drill officers as well as men, we could expand these regiments from within to their maximum strength and have an effective Army from the first day they are called for active service.

Mr. HAY. Are there not now a sufficient number of these officers to officer all the organizations under the present law?

Mr. HULL. No; there are not, with the number of cadets that we have, and there will not be even with this 10, and I am glad there will not be the full number, because I am glad to see them come up from the ranks, and they will still have as much opportunity in the future as they have had in the past for that promotion.

Mr. HAY. I will ask the gentleman if this increase was not originally on the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. HULL. I think not. I think it was originally proposed in the committee on the Military Academy bill.

Mr. HAY. My recollection and that of the gentleman do not agree.

Mr. HULL. It does not make a particle of difference which is right.

Mr. HAY. I understand that; but you are now putting on this bill an increase which was not contemplated when the Military Academy bill was introduced.

Mr. HULL. We are putting it on here because in a conference the conferees have got to give and take.

Mr. HAY. Oh, I understand all that.

Mr. HULL. And when the conferees of the Senate said, in substance, "We are giving up a million dollars, and we are giving up the purchase of Constitution Island and every point in issue between the two Houses, and we insist on having the rights of the Senate on something," I say that this House has no right to criticise its conferees for their action.

Mr. HAY. I am not criticising the Senate. I am criticising nobody. I am criticising the policy. Now, if the contention of the gentleman is going to prevail, then we ought always to give up something to the Senate, no matter what the rights of the case are. If the contention of the House in instructing the conferees on the Army bill the other day is to be maintained, then we ought not to give up anything which is not right.

Mr. HULL. Well, I do not think we have given up anything not entirely proper to concede.

Mr. HAY. I understand that. I do not think we ought to increase these cadets. I think there are enough there now, or will be, and I do not see any reason why this should be increased.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] for a question.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Has it not been necessary in the recent war to appoint a great many officers who have had no West Point education because there were not enough West Point graduates?

Mr. HULL. Oh, not only have they been appointed, a large number of them, because of that, but they are appointing a hundred within the last two months from the ranks and from civil life because the trained men could not be had from West Point.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like the gentleman to give me two minutes to criticise the conference committee.

Mr. HULL. In a moment. This increase of ten provided for in this bill is not an extravagant increase under any consideration whatever. I am not in favor of increasing the cadets beyond the needs of the Government. I have never had any sympathy with the idea of educating them to let them go back into civil life; but up to this point, and with the law as it stands, with the increase of ten, I believe the Government will absorb all of them and leave places for those from the ranks and civil life as well still to be appointed to make good the vacancies.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is not the policy being pursued by the Government of reducing the Army, and if so, why is it necessary to increase these commissioned officers?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, we are not increasing the commissioned officers, and there is no policy to reduce the commissioned officers.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It operates to increase the Army if we make more lieutenants.

Mr. HULL. The policy is to reduce the enlisted force. We are not reducing lieutenants, captains, majors, and colonels.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Ought we not to do so if we reduce the Army?

Mr. HULL. I say no.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like you to give me two minutes to criticise this conference report.

Mr. HULL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs seems to resent the idea that this House can criticise the action of a conference committee. We recall but very recently an occasion when this House did criticise a measure that the Senate had insisted upon and that the conferees of the House, I think, had agreed to—the Selfridge claim. You recollect that this House asserted its authority and its opposition to that measure. Now, I say this much in vindication of the wisdom of the House in opposing these conference reports: Simply because some worthy Senators and worthy members of this House felicitate themselves, as the gentleman has done this morning, upon reaching an agreement it will not do to perpetrate upon the House the old chestnut that we have to "give and take." We ought to give when it is proper to give, and we ought to take when it is proper to take, but when it is wrong to give or wrong to take, this House ought to assert its constitutional right and its self-respect and dignity and refuse either to give or take.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very evident from what the gentleman has said that the policy of the Government at this time is to decrease the Army. It is true that the decrease so far has taken place in respect to the volunteer force, or the enlisted men, more properly speaking. But, Mr. Speaker, that is a policy of reducing the military forces of the United States. With that policy set on foot, of which I approve, because I do not want to see this Government always embroiled in war, always supporting a vast army, paying out to-day one hundred and twenty millions of the people's money for the support of the Army, when prior to the Spanish war we paid out upon an average only $24,000,000 per year——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Give me one more minute.

Mr. HULL. I can not do it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have a little more criticism I should like to make on your top-heavy army that you want to create.

Mr. HULL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to criticise the action of the conference committee in making this report or recommending an agreement in this provision, because I appreciate the embarrassment which the conferees may have in making an adjustment with the Senate. But, Mr. Speaker, when the proposition to increase the Army was before the House I did not vote for it. I shall not vote for a provision of this sort under any circumstances, to increase the number of cadets or the officers of the Army.

There has already been an increase within a year or two of a hundred cadets. There will be an increase by reason of the increase of the membership of the House of 30 or 40 cadets. Here is a proposition to increase by 10 more cadets. There is no limit to propositions of this kind. There is no reason why the number of cadets should be increased, unless the proposition is that we have enough cadets to fully officer the Army, and I do not understand the gentleman himself, the chairman of the committee, would favor that proposition. There is a steady tendency on the part of Congress, though not, I believe, on the part of the Executive at present, to increase the Army; and I dare say, Mr. Speaker, that most of the troubles which the country is now having, and particularly which this side of the House is suffering from in the Philippine Islands, comes from the very large increase in the Army which was made by this Congress two years ago.

Mr. HULL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I would not speak on this subject, except that there is so much misunderstanding of it. The number at West Point—will the gentleman from Illinois give me his attention, as I am speaking to him especially.

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to give the gentleman my attention at any time.

Mr. PARKER. The number at West Point up to a few years ago, referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, was for an army of 25,000 men. Our Army at present has a minimum of 59,000 men.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly; if you do not consume my three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that when the Army was 25,000 men only the number of cadets graduated at West Point were more than sufficient to officer the Army?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir; they were not.

Mr. MANN. Why did they keep turning them out into civil life, then?

Mr. PARKER. That was when we had an army of 10,000 men. When we increased to 25,000 the Military Academy was not sufficient to officer the Army.

Mr. CLAYTON. Was it not top-heavy?

Mr. PARKER. We were then appointing from civil life and appointing from the ranks. Now, when our Army has been more than doubled in officers since we had 25,000 men, West Point has been increased about one-third. There is a hundred increase now, and when we get the new increase West Point will be increased about one-third, which is entirely insufficient to furnish the proper proportion of officers graduated from West Point for the present Army. This is the first argument for this amendment. But there is much more to be said.

In the last three years we have had soldiers and officers without homes, serving in the Army all over the world, whose sons want an opportunity to go to West Point, and who are practically without any Congressman to whom they can appeal. The 30 appointments in the hands of the President have been used exclusively for the benefit of those men who are giving their life for the country. It was reduced from 40, years ago, to 20; it has been put up to 30, and 10 more are utterly insufficient for the noble purpose of taking care of these men and giving to them an equal chance with those who live here and have political friends to take care of them.

Mr. Speaker, this is a just amendment on its merits.

Mr. HULL. I call for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HAY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Pending the announcement of the vote,

Mr. HAY. I make the point of no quorum present and voting.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the Chair announce the result of the vote?

The SPEAKER (after the counting). It is evident to the Chair that there is not a quorum here, and the Chair will order the yeas and nays. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in members. Those in favor of the adoption of the conference report will vote "yea;" those opposed "nay;" and those present and not voting will vote "present."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 88, nays 59, answered "present" 34, not voting 171; as follows:

After the completion of the second call and before the announcement, the following took place:

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Can we have an announcement of the vote?

The SPEAKER. It is not yet footed up, the clerks are verifying the statement. The Chair will state to the gentleman also that we are trying to get a quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The House is entitled to know whether there is a quorum present or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not obliged to make the announcement until the footing is completed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The House is entitled to know whether we have a quorum present or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated to the gentleman that the Clerk is making the footings.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The House is entitled to know how many members are present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not obliged to announce the result until a quorum is reached. The Chair has stated that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How many do we lack, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask for the information of the House that we have stated the number present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that the Clerk is footing it up and verifying the situation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am willing to wait a reasonable time for the additions to be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to wait until it is footed up, whether he is willing or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I demand that it be footed up within a reasonable time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not control the action of the clerks, who are faithfully trying to discharge their duty.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Nor can the Speaker control the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not controlling the action of the House, but he is waiting for the record to be made up. The gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee is only asking that the House be informed——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order. The Chair has undertaken faithfully to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing to wait a reasonable time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is evidently not a quorum present. Will a motion to adjourn be in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. If seconded by a majority of those present, it will be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, it would have to be seconded to be in order.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn. As many as second the motion of the gentleman from Alabama will rise. [After counting.] Thirty-six gentlemen rising. The noes will rise. [After counting.] Sixty-eight members rising. On this question those seconding the motion are 36 and those opposed are 68; so the motion fails of a second, and the officers will proceed to make the quorum as originally directed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Have we waited long enough for the Clerk to make the additions? If so, we would be glad to have the announcement as to how many are present.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, when a quorum failed to be present, the Chair directed the doors to be closed, the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in members of the House to make a quorum, the roll was called, and members are now responding in pursuance of that order, so that we may make a quorum to do the business of the country and of this House. When the gentleman first rose there were 17 less than a quorum, as the Chair now ascertains, but members are still coming in.

The following pairs were announced:

For the session:

Mr. METCALF with Mr. WHEELER.
Mr. DEEMER with Mr. MUTCHLER.

On this vote:
Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. SPARKMAN.
The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 88; the nays 59; answering "present," 33; total, 180. A quorum appears. The ayes have it, and the report is agreed to. The Doorkeeper will reopen the doors.
On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the sundry civil bill. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the conference report and the statement, as both of them are in the RECORD this morning.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of both the statement and the report. Is there objection?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, why omit the statement? That is the only source of information, unless the gentleman himself is going to make a statement.
Mr. CANNON. Because it is in the RECORD this morning.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I know it is. But I do not think putting it in the RECORD ought to dispense with its reading.
Mr. CANNON. Then let it be read.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reading of the report will be dispensed with, and the statement may be read.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to say so in explanation, I think if we get into the habit of simply taking the publication of a statement as sufficient, the last habit will be worse than the other.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.
The Clerk read the statement, to be found in the proceedings of June 20, 1902.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.
Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to interrupt the gentleman for a moment, if I may.
Mr. CANNON. Certainly.
Mr. BARTLETT. I think it is all right, but I desire simply to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that there is no provision in this conference report with reference to any amount of money to be appropriated for the public building at Macon. The omnibus public-building bill carried for that city an appropriation of $156,000, $31,000 of which was to be expended in the purchase of additional site for the improvement of the building. Now, the situation is this: In 1899 there was passed by Congress a bill authorizing $58,000 to be expended, and that amount was appropriated for and is available. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury at one time reported to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that it would be necessary to have appropriated here $50,000. Upon a review of that, he reported that there would not be necessary any appropriation to be made in this sundry civil bill. I have just received a message from the Supervising Architect in which he states that in his opinion the $58,000 appropriated under the act of 1899 would be available for all they could do up to the 4th of March next. Now, the proposition upon which I desire to get an expression of opinion from the chairman of the Appropriation Committee, if he will kindly give it, is, if these are the facts, whether there would be any trouble in using the $31,000 of the amount appropriated for this site? I think that is about as far as we will be able to go.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has stated the matter as I understand it. This statement was made very closely by the Supervising Architect, submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and it received his approval. Besides the amount appropriated there is power in the omnibus bill to contract, so that I have no doubt, so far as I am concerned, that there is more than money enough to run the Macon public building up to the 4th of March next, including the purchase of a site.
Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for the statement, and I think he understands why I could not permit the occasion to pass without undertaking to see that it was disposed of properly.
Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, there is no question but what the appropriation is ample to comply with all that is necessary, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the conference report.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.
The question was taken, and the report agreed to.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments set out in the report not agreed to. There are quite a number of them and the report states them. Unless there is a separate vote demanded upon some one, or a motion to concur upon some one, I will make the motion in gross.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion to concur to one of the amendments.
Mr. CANNON. Which amendment?
Mr. GROSVENOR. One hundred and sixty.
Mr. CANNON. Then I will modify my motion to that extent.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands a separate vote upon amendment 160, the Chair understands.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.
The SPEAKER. That one will be left out, and if there is no separate vote demanded on the other amendments the Chair will submit them in gross. The question is on further insisting on the disagreement of the House to the other amendments of the Senate, omitting 160.
Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, before the question is taken, I will ask if the committee of conference agreed on that item with reference to the plans for the Smithsonian building?
Mr. CANNON. Yes.
The question was taken, and the motion agreed to.
Mr. GROSVENOR. I move that the House concur in Senate amendment No. 160, which I wish to have read to the House.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 160. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Memorial bridge across the Potomac River: To enable the Secretary of War to begin the construction of a memorial bridge connecting the Potomac Park with the Arlington estate property, $100,000: Provided, That so much of the said amount as may be necessary may be expended for the purpose of securing and determining the proper plans for said bridge, said location and plans to be in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary of War and to be subject to the approval of the President and Congress: And provided further, That the cost of said bridge and the approaches thereto shall not exceed $2,500,000.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] whether he desires some time. I should like to see if we can agree about the time.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Some time is requested by gentlemen here on the floor. It has been suggested that we have thirty minutes on a side.
Mr. CANNON. Let us suggest fifteen on a side.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Let us split the difference and say twenty.
Mr. CANNON. There is nothing mean about me. I ask unanimous consent for twenty minutes on a side.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time for debate on this amendment be limited to twenty minutes on a side, twenty minutes in favor and twenty minutes against. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I shall only occupy time enough to state what this amendment is. At the request of certain gentlemen connected with the Grand Army of the Republic and interested in this memorial bridge, which has been the subject of a great deal of discussion and Presidential suggestion to the Houses of Congress, I want to support the amendment to make the initial step toward the building of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River that shall connect the city of Washington with Arlington, the resting place of so many of the dead of the Union Army; and I yield so much of the twenty minutes as the gentleman desires to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY].
Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, this proposition to build a bridge across the Potomac has been pending in Congress for fifteen years or more. It has been before the Senate and the House at almost every Congress. The Senate has repeatedly passed an amendment to the sundry civil bill providing for the building of a bridge to connect the capital with Arlington. Several Congresses ago the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported a bill in favor of building a bridge across the Potomac, the report being made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN]. No action was had upon that bill by the House. In a past Congress—I believe in 1900—a provision similar to this, except that the limit of cost of the bridge in that case was some $5,000,000, came over from the Senate on the sundry civil bill, and a vote was had in the House upon the proposition to build the bridge. It carried on a division, but upon the yeas and nays it was defeated by 116 to 130.
There has never been any recommendation from any Government official against the necessity for building this bridge. As far back as 1893 Secretary Lamont reported in favor of the absolute necessity of connecting the capital with Fort Myer and Arlington. He followed it up in his reports in 1894 and 1895. Secretary Alger made an equally strong report while he was Secretary of War, and the present Secretary of War, Mr. Root, has recommended in the strongest terms the necessity for building this bridge.

Mr. STEELE. Have these gentlemen to whom you refer always contended that the Government should build this bridge without aid from the State of Virginia or anybody else?

Mr. RIXEY. They have. They have contended, and contended properly, that the bridge ought to be built by the Government. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that when this matter was considered by one of the committees while I was present, some one suggested that perhaps the State of Virginia ought to pay a part of the cost of this bridge. I said, "Well, if that is the disposition of Congress, let a proposition be made to the State of Virginia to contribute to the expenditure of building this bridge; but of course if Virginia pays a third or half the expense of building this bridge from the national capital to Arlington, it must have some control over the bridge." The committee at once said they could not consent to that. It does seem to me that this bridge ought to be built, and built by the Government alone. It will be upon property belonging to the Government upon this side and upon the Arlington estate upon the other side. The Government owns the whole of the Potomac River. It owns the property upon this side, and it owns the property upon the other side of the river. This bridge will connect the capital with the national cemetery.

In time past there has been some little objection, perhaps, on the part of some members to voting for this proposition upon the ground that Arlington was not in one sense a national cemetery, but a cemetery for only one section of the country. But if there was ever anything in that contention it has ceased to exist, because since the Spanish-American war Arlington is a cemetery for the dead soldiers of this whole country, and there is no reason, in my judgment, why any member should refuse to vote for the bridge on the ground that it is not the cemetery of the whole country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I did not catch the amount of the ultimate cost of this memorial bridge.

Mr. RIXEY. It is not to exceed $2,500,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman think it will be confined within that sum?

Mr. RIXEY. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And he thinks that bridge ought to be built by the people of the United States or by the United States Government as a memorial bridge because it reaches a cemetery?

Mr. RIXEY. Not simply as a memorial bridge, but it ought to be built because it is necessary, and then it ought to be made a memorial for the soldiers who have died for their country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I appreciate the fact that this contemplated bridge connects the gentleman's district with the city of Washington. His district is well represented, and he is performing his duty well; but the city of Washington, without any Representative, seems to be getting more than any other section of the country or any large portion of the country when it is proposed to pay the whole sum out of the United States Treasury. For utility bridges in the District of Columbia the District pays one-half of the cost, but here the memorial feature is shrewdly attached and is urged as a reason why the whole sum should be borne by the United States Treasury.

Mr. RIXEY. The city of Washington in some respects will get more and ought to get more, because it is the only city which is the national capital, and it must have appropriations which are made for that purpose. As I said a moment ago, when interrupted, there has not been any adverse recommendation from the Government, from the Secretary of War, or from the President. There have been four or five urgent recommendations by the Secretary of War, the last being as late as April of the present year. The late President McKinley, in one of his messages to Congress, commended in the strongest terms the building of this bridge. He said, among other things:

> The proposed bridge would be a convenience to all the people from every part of the country who visit the national cemetery, an ornament to the capital of the nation, and forever stand as a monument to American patriotism. I do not doubt that Congress will give the enterprise still further proof of its favor and approval.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this matter was before the House in 1900, the gentleman from Illinois, who is opposing this provision now, then urged Congress to wait six months before authorizing the building of the bridge. Since that time the Long Bridge here has been separated to some extent, the railroad part being separated from the highway part. The idea has been that the highway part of the Long Bridge would accommodate the travel; but it can not and never will accommodate the travel that would go to Arlington. It is now urged that this new Long Bridge does away with the necessity for the memorial bridge. Let me call your attention to the history of the Long Bridge. In 1867 this Government gave that bridge to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad on condition that it would keep up the highway part for the traveling public. During the last Congress provision for the building of a separate highway bridge was made, relieving the railroad from all necessity for keeping up the highway part of the old bridge.

The highway part of the Long Bridge could only accommodate those people who lived below the city of Washington, Alexandria and vicinity. There never has been but one bridge connecting this city with Arlington, and that is the Aqueduct Bridge; and every one who has been there on Memorial Day and upon occasions when distinguished men have been buried there knows that that bridge is totally inadequate to accommodate the travel. So great is this travel that it practically stops traffic for business upon the Aqueduct Bridge for many hours during the day.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when this bridge ought to be built. The Government needs it, and I am glad to add my voice and vote for the building of this bridge. I am glad to aid in the construction of what will be a monument and memorial to the patriotism of the solders of this country.

I now yield back the time which is left to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas, a member of the committee.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take but little time in the discussion of this amendment, but I do want to say that I am opposed to an appropriation for the construction of a memorial bridge on this bill. If there is necessity for the erection of such a bridge, the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction of that subject. The estimate placed upon the cost of this project is $2,000,000. There is nobody familiar with the scheme that is involved who believes that it can be built for $2,000,000 or that it will be. The estimates for the bridge run all the way from five to seventeen million dollars. A work of this sort ought to be carefully considered by a committee that has jurisdiction of the subject. The plans ought to be worked out in a careful and elaborate way by capable architects and bridge builders. They have not been within the limit here proposed. I hope that gentlemen on this side of the House at least will not vote for this proposition at this time, whether they are in favor of a memorial bridge across the Potomac at the place proposed or not. This is not the time nor the way to do it.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a bill in reference to a memorial bridge has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for a number of Congresses, and it has been pending before that committee the entire time during which I have been a member for the last five years. It has been urged, and will be urged by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], that this is the proper time to commence the construction of a memorial bridge in memory of the soldiers both of the North and of the South. This is a plea which can be advanced with a good deal of strength by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio. It has been a plea which has been urged before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, not by the soldiers, not by the Grand Army of the North, not by the Confederate soldiers of the South, but by one or two gentlemen who live in Washington and who purport to represent them. Mr. Speaker, it was called to the attention of the members of the committee that although every one of them, at least from the North, represent districts in which there are large numbers of soldiers no one of the committee had ever been requested by any constituents in his own district, in conversation or otherwise, to support this memorial bridge.

It will be said now that they are all in favor of it. Why, Mr. Speaker, I happen to represent a district like other Northern districts, in which there are a great number, both of Union soldiers and ex-Confederate soldiers, and during the campaign and at other times we come in contact with these men personally. While this matter has been pending before the committee, of which I happen to be a member, and we have had it under consideration time and time again, not one of these people, these ex soldiers both from the North and the South living in my district, has ever mentioned to me the subject of a memorial bridge.

This is an effort now to prostitute the desire to revere the memory of the soldiers for the purpose of advancing a real estate scheme.

The people who are interested in the construction of a memorial bridge, or a bridge of any kind, to cost the fancy sum which is proposed here, are not the soldiers of the North or the South scattered throughout the land, but they are the people in the District of Columbia, and on the other side of the Potomac, who want the construction not only of this fancy bridge, but a fancy roadway running from the bridge down into Virginia.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RIXEY. How do you account for the unanimous and strong recommendations made by the Secretaries of War? Are they interested in any real estate scheme? How do you account for the recommendation of President McKinley?

Mr. MANN. I have never had my attention called to any report of any Secretary of War or the President in favor of the plan such as is proposed by this amendment. Bridges may be necessary across the Potomac to connect Washington with Arlington. Additional bridges may be wanted, but no one has proposed, so far as I know, the construction of this expensive, purely fancy memorial bridge. If the Government wishes to build a bridge across to Arlington, that is an entirely different proposition. This proposition is to construct a bridge at great cost—first, for the benefit of the property on this side of the river, and second, for the benefit of the property on the other side of the river, to be followed by a road leading down to Mount Vernon, in Virginia, and perhaps farther, for the benefit of property all along the line in Virginia. I protest against this extravagance.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to know that my friend who has just taken his seat can always discover a real estate speculation in any project before the House. I think he voted the other day for a scheme that involves $500,000,000——

Mr. MANN. It did not require a discoverer to discover this.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not require a discoverer to find $500,000,000 in the real estate speculation in which a large number of trans-continental railroads are interested, for which the gentleman voted a few days ago on the subject of the irrigation of arid lands.

Let us see whether the gentleman has studied the history of this affair. I can only refer to the President's message sent to Congress in 1899 by one William McKinley. After pointing out that it is to be a memorial bridge, a memorial to American patriotism, he states:

The designs are now being prepared, and as soon as completed will be submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War.

The identical proposition here now—

The proposed bridge would be a convenience to all the people from every part of the country who visit the national cemetery, an ornament to the capital of the nation, and forever stand as a monument to American patriotism.

That is what William McKinley said. I have in my hand——

Mr. MANN. If the plans had been prepared, why does the bill provide $100,000 for preparing them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. So as not to be bound by any particular plan.

Now, the recommendation was first made by Secretary Lamont, of the War Department, in 1893; repeated by him in 1894, repeated by him in 1895, urged strongly by Secretary Alger in 1898, and then by Secretary Root in 1899, and then by the message of the President of the United States.

So this is not a new project, but has been recommended and indorsed by all the Secretaries of War since the project took any kind of shape, both in Democratic and Republican Administrations. I now yield five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question, I think, but that some kind of a bridge for travel and traffic connecting Washington with Arlington is necessary. The number of years that this matter has been agitated shows the importance that has been given to this subject by our Secretaries of War and by the different branches of Congress. Lately this has taken a patriotic turn. For many years it was simply under the shape of mere business, and now the President of the United States has recommended that a bridge be built which shall be a memorial to the patriotism and valor of those who have died in defense of their country.

Some gentleman on the other side asked the question if the city of Washington would not get the benefit of this provision. Certainly it would; and the city of Washington, as the capital of the country, has received the benefit not only of this proposed measure, but it has received the benefit of the magnificent Washington Monument, erected to the memory of Washington, the soldier, the statesman, and the patriot. It has received the benefit of the monument to Lincoln; it has received the benefit of the monuments erected to Garfield, and Hancock, and Thomas, and Sherman, and McPherson, and Rawlins, and Farragut, and Logan, and all the other beautiful monuments that dot this city, but among all these monuments there is not one in this city to commemorate the services of the men who carried a musket. It is no argument to say that such a monument as this would inure to the benefit of the citizens of the city of Washington. It inures to the benefit of the whole country.

And what is it to commemorate? To commemorate the valor of more than half a million men who died or were mortally wounded upon the battlefield—to commemorate the valor of more than a million men who were permanently disabled during that conflict.

And I am very glad to see that this proposition is advocated by a member on the other side; a gentleman who, while not of the political faith of this side, believes that it is due to the memory of these men that such a memorial should be erected.

I was very much impressed a few years ago when I made a visit to the South, visiting all the battlefields and the scenes where I had campaigned. It was in 1885, and at a little railroad station where I alighted I was met by 12 or 15 old Confederate soldiers, and the first thing that they asked as I alighted from the train was: "Is there any news from General Grant?" It was during his last, fatal illness. I told them the latest news that the newspapers had published, and was the center of a company for an hour, discussing the condition of General Grant and the country; and to my great amazement, each and every one of those old Confederate soldiers evinced as much anxiety for the recovery of General Grant and as much sympathy as I had manifested. And one of them said with a tear in his eye, "I was one of those men who, at Appomattox, rode away on my horse when General Grant said 'They will need their horses and their mules for their spring plowing.'" General Grant was never greater than when he uttered those words, unless it was a few weeks afterwards when, at Mount McGregor, while suffering from his last illness, he sent out from that sick room the message to the country, "Let us have peace." [Applause.]

And when, some years after, William McKinley became President of the United States he inaugurated and carried on an administration of such broad-minded statesmanship and patriotism that when the hour of trouble came the whole country, North and South, rallied to the defense of the flag. One of the most remarkable illustrations of the changed conditions in this country and of the patriotism that has taken the place of the hostility that once ruled the hearts of those who fought against the flag was witnessed at the second inauguration of President McKinley, March 4, 1901, when Gen. Joe Wheeler, the ex-Confederate cavalry leader, dressed in the uniform of a major-general of the United States Army, rode at the head of one of the divisions in the inaugural parade. Truly, "these are days of rusted swords and shields, of loosened helmets and broken spears." These are days of fraternity. And what more fitting time to commemorate that fraternity than now, while some of the veterans of the great civil war are still alive? What more fitting place than here at the national capital? What more fitting way than by connecting that capital with the State of Virginia and the home of the greatest soldier of the Confederacy?

And now, as the Grand Army of the Republic will hold its national encampment in the city of Washington next October for perhaps the last time, let the appropriation be made, so that the cornerstone of the foundations may be laid and the enterprise dedicated in the presence of these gray-haired veterans. Let the bridge be built as an everlasting memorial to the men who preserved the nation and as an incentive to the highest patriotism and the loftiest devotion to our country's cause.

It is said that in one of the art galleries of France there is an equestrian statue of one of the field marshals. He is represented with a wooden foot in one stirrup, an empty sleeve across his breast, with a patch over one eye to conceal its loss, and with this inscription underneath: "He has scattered his limbs and his blood on a hundred battlefields. His mode of warfare was such that he has nothing left sound but his heart."

That picture is one of the noted pictures of France, and inspires the Frenchmen to the most patriotic effort. So let us construct a bridge connecting the capital with the national cemetery, where 16,000 Union soldiers lie buried, which shall ever inspire us and those who come after us to emulate their great deeds, and to lift us up to the conception of the great principles for which they died.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will now use up his time. I am entitled to close, and after I have submitted a few broken remarks I shall be ready for the vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How much time, Mr. Speaker, have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. After reading a letter from the Secretary of War to the Speaker of this House, I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER]. The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 16, 1902.

SIR: I beg leave to transmit to you herewith a letter from Mr. Thomas S. Hopkins, chairman of the committee on memorial bridge of the Grand Army of the Republic, urging that the corner stone of the proposed memorial bridge to connect the capital city with the heights of Arlington should be laid during the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, during the week beginning October 6, 1902. The suggestion is so appropriate, and it seems to me so desirable that the proposed memorial to the enlisted men of the civil war should be begun under the auspices of the survivors of that great struggle, that I have caused to be prepared and transmit herewith also a memorandum showing the history and present condition of the bridge project; and I venture to express the hope that the request of the Grand Army of the Republic may receive favorable consideration from Congress.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have so short a time in which to speak upon this measure. This subject has been in agitation for a great many years. The inadequacy of the communication between the capital of the nation and the territory which lies adjacent to it has been apparent for many long years. My friend Gen. Eppa Hunton projected for a long time a bridge across the river above the Aqueduct Bridge at a point known as the Three Sisters, there being there three islands, which would furnish opportunity for the structure of the middle pier. A great many other projects have been proposed.

We certainly ought to utilize this great river which comes flowing down from the mountains of Virginia and should make use of it for the ornamentation of the capital in some way or another. All the nations of the world having great streams flowing by their capitals have felt proud to utilize them in this way. In London, where the Thames flows through the heart of the city, they constructed the great London Bridge and the Westminster Bridge. Since that time—in more modern periods—they have built the Victoria Bridge, costing over £2,000,000, and the Albert Bridge, costing about the same, and a great many others. To-day the great ornamentation of the vast city of London is to be found in the magnificent structures which span that greatest stream of commerce, not only in Great Britain, but in the world.

Here we have across this adjacent river—the Potomac—only a structure which is an eyesore to everybody who looks at it. I mean the Long Bridge—a structure which serves simply as a dam and which ought to be done away with. The railroads that own it and control it and utilize it by virtue of grants of Congress ought to be required to raise it so that no drawbridge will be required. There should be long approaches on either side; and they ought to take away that dam, which oftentimes blocks up the waters of the Potomac until your streets leading from this Capitol to the White House are overflowed. I have passed over them when the water would strike the axles of the carriage in which I was riding. That bridge ought to be done away with, and this bridge ought to be built, on scientific principles, on principles of architectural beauty and power combined, that shall make it an ornament of the city, and shall span that beautiful stream which in every way ought to be ornamented, not only in the interests of the capital, for the capital has no interest which is not the country's interest, but in the interests of the people of the whole country; and I hope to see the time, Mr. Chairman, when the State of Virginia, animated by a proper spirit, will cede back, retrocede to the United States, the land originally ceded by the State of Virginia to make the 10 miles district square in which the capital of the nation was to be.

The Seine River, in France, which flows by that most beautiful city, has been spanned by innumerable bridges, which knit together all parts of the city. In their last years' exposition the beautiful bridge spanning the Seine was regarded as the greatest and most beautiful part of that wondrous exposition.

Let us imitate the example of these great cities of the Old World and utilize our own beautiful Potomac, which flows by the doors of the grandest capital of the world, and build this memorial bridge "in memoriam" to the brave soldiers on both sides of our civil strife, which developed on both sides the grandest military genius which has marked any epoch in the history of the world.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the committee will bear with me for a very brief space of time I will ask for a vote. Sentiment is magnificent and splendid, but sentiment has one danger, and that is that it is seized upon to promote improvements and appropriations that ought not to be made, with or without sentiment. I came to Washington twenty-nine years ago, at the commencement of Grant's second term. The papers were then as full of memorial bridge as they are now. There was quite as much talk about it, and from that time to this there has been a regular round robin. I do not blame my friend from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] for wanting this bridge built. Why, it is just across the Potomac. I expect if I were situated as he is that I would be for it, too. I do not blame the people of Washington for wanting this bridge built, whether it is necessary or not. I expect if this was my home and my interests were here that I should want it, but it is a very small portion of the 80,000,000 people who would be directly benefited by this bridge.

Now, then, the public service, in my opinion, does not demand it What is the fact? We have an Aqueduct Bridge over here at Georgetown. That leads from Georgetown, this side of the District, over to Arlington. That bridge is now being rebuilt. We have just spent more than $100,000 in repairing it, and in the District bill as returned to us by the Senate, there are sixty-odd thousand dollars more for other repairs. It is to be enlarged, strengthened—practically rebuilt. In the meantime it is being occupied. More than that, the legislation was enacted a year ago to build a highway bridge from within about 2,000 feet of the Monument across to Virginia, at an expense of between five and six hundred thousand dollars. It is not built yet, but the District bill, which I hold in my hand, extends the time two years, by a Senate amendment, to construct that bridge, and increases the cost to a million. Now, that bridge ought to be built; it is a practical measure; it will be built; it is already authorized by law. In my judgment the location ought to be changed to about Seventeenth street on this side, and to land on the other side at Arlington, and it can be built for less money in that way.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that that bridge is simply to take the place of the Long Bridge, which is now in existence.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; the railroad has nothing to do with it. The railroad builds its own bridge.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand; but there is a bridge now for highway travel over that bridge.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it is a joint bridge.

Mr. RIXEY. This bridge simply takes the place of that highway bridge.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; and so far as I am now advised, and so far as I am concerned, when the limit is enlarged to a million of dollars I am one member who will insist on its being moved up to Seventeenth street on this side and Arlington on the other. It is not a memorial bridge, but a bridge that is needed. Well, now, when we get that which is already authorized we will have gotten all that is needed.

Mr. RIXEY. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman again. I might agree with his proposition to remove the Long Bridge to Arlington, except for one thing, the present Long Bridge, the highway part of it, accommodates many thousands of people upon the other side. Enterprises have grown up there, and if you take away the highway bridge from its present location and move it to Arlington, those people have no way of getting into the city. It would involve much inconvenience and much loss.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it is not a very great move; but then I am not discussing that. That will take care of itself. The Aqueduct Bridge at Georgetown being rebuilt, and now occupied, this highway bridge already authorized, and proposing to increase its cost to a million, will make quite all the bridges that we need.

Now, what is the proposition? The highway bridge, half and half. The Aqueduct Bridge that is being rebuilt, half by the District and half by the United States; this memorial bridge, all by the United States. To cost how much? Two millions and a half; to be built between the highway bridge and the Aqueduct Bridge. Well, now, that two million and a half will not cover the cost. The plans already made run from five to seventeen million dollars, and in the name of the flag and an appropriation, with the surrounding of sentiment, the Father only knows what it will cost before it is done if we commence. Now, there are other things that the District of Columbia needs worse. It needs more water and better water. It needs more sewerage and better sewerage. We have already authorized a municipal building that will cost, when it is done, over $2,000,000, although the limitation is under that. There are lots of things that need doing here. We need to reclaim the Eastern Branch far more than we do to have this bridge, in order to keep the people up there from shaking to death with the chills and fever. There are a hundred things that the plain people, the multitude, the hundreds of thousands that are in Washington, and that come and go, need far more than they need this memorial bridge. You can not do all these things at once.

Now, if I thought there was any danger of the House voting to concur with the Senate in this appropriation, I would move an amendment making it half and half, half to be paid out of the District revenues and half out of the United States Treasury. But I hope and believe that the good sense and good judgment of the House will be against the proposition, at least at this time, and I am inclined to think for all time. We have memorials on the battlefield at appropriate places. Why, you could build a balloon as a memorial. You can build anything and call it "in memory of." Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] read a letter from the commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. I have great respect for him. I do not know who asked him to write it, but if I had the power to call up every soldier of the Union and Confederate armies and they would listen to a plain statement of the facts, if I did not have nine out ten against this proposition I would miss my guess.

The Secretary of War has recommended it, yes. Well, now, public officials recommend a great many things which we do not do. That is their business—to recommend. It is our business to breathe the breath of life into legislative propositions and make them living things. Our function is entirely separate from that of the Executive, and this recommendation does not meet my approval as one member of the House. Therefore, I will ask a vote, and trust that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to concur in the Senate amendment will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment No. 160 and concur in the same.

The motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CANNON, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. MCRAE.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER. Now, in pursuance to the order, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will take the chair.

[Mr. ADAMS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the Administration in its policy pertaining to the Philippine Islands. I am in favor of the indefinite retention by this Government of the Philippine Islands. By indefinite retention I mean simply retention until such time, if such time shall ever come, when the changed condition in the affairs of the world, and particularly in the Philippine Islands, shall make it appear to be for the best interests of the people of the United States and of the people of the Philippine Islands that a separate and independent government should be established for them.

I will join heart and hand with the most ardent lover of liberty, but it must be that liberty which redounds to the peace, comfort, prosperity, and happiness of the whole people, and not in that misconception of liberty which gives unbridled license to the few to practically enslave the many, either in the name of home rule or in the sacred name of liberty itself. If our occupation and sovereignty in the Philippine Islands is not beneficial to the Philippine people, then we should speedily retire from the islands. If our occupation and sovereignty in the Philippine Islands works an injury to the people of the United States, then as speedily as can be done with honor to ourselves as a nation we should surrender the sovereignty and retire from the islands. If, on the other hand, our occupation and sovereignty of the Philippine Islands is a benefit at once to the people of these islands and to the people of the United States, then clearly we should retain the possession and sovereignty of these islands.

The inhabitants of the Philippine Islands now and for a long time have been divided into about eighty tribes. They range in their condition of intellectual development all the way from the lowest and most barbarous species of mankind to a high order of intellectual enlightenment. Of the latter class there are relatively few. By far the greater number are in that lower stage of intellectual development. Of the more enlightened tribes it has been estimated that not to exceed one-tenth of them can read or write. Of the tribes in the lower stage of intellectual development, scarcely any of them can read or write.

Of all of these tribes the Tagalog is the most warlike and perhaps the most intelligent. At the close of our war with Spain there was an armed force of Filipinos. This armed force consisted mainly, if not wholly, of the people of the Tagalog tribe. Aguinaldo was the chief or president. They had in name at least a congress. Under these conditions it will not be denied that whatever of government there would have been established in the Philippine Islands, if we had yielded our sovereignty, would have been under the leadership of Aguinaldo and his government. In determining whether our occupation of these islands and the maintenance of our sovereignty there are of advantage or disadvantage, a blessing or a curse, to the people of the Philippine Islands, we must take into account what this government of Aguinaldo would have been if we had come away.

We must take cognizance of known facts concerning Aguinaldo and his government. The Filipinos under the leadership of Aguinaldo and a few others had been in insurrection against the Spanish Government. Rebellion had followed rebellion, insurrection had followed insurrection for many years, until the islands were in a chronic state of war. In this condition of affairs Aguinaldo accepted a sum of money from the Spanish Government, said to be $400,000, and left the Philippine Islands, going to Hongkong, China. The claim was made for him afterwards that he accepted this money for the purpose of using it in aid of the Philippine insurrection. This is the excuse or apology that has been offered in palliation of his acceptance of this bribe.

I do not believe that his environment at that time and his conduct afterwards justify the claim; but if this claim is admitted, it showed him to be capable of entering into a bargain for a money consideration with the Spanish Government to leave the islands and desist from further rebellion against the authority of Spain, with a full purpose then present in his heart of violating that agreement, treacherously obtaining the money and using it to further the cause which he was agreeing to abandon. While I do not believe that the facts, circumstances, and surroundings in which he was then placed justify the belief that he was prompted by any patriotic motives, however misconceived they were in point of honor, yet in either event it shows the character of the man unmistakably.

After remaining for a time at Hongkong he started to Europe, stopping on his way at Singapore. There he met an Englishman by the name of Bray, who had lived for thirty years at Manila, and with whom Aguinaldo was well acquainted. It has been published, and I think reliably so, that this Englishman advised him that he should return to the Philippine Islands; that in the scenes then being enacted in the world it was quite within the range of possibilities that an empire could be formed in the Philippine Islands and that he, Aguinaldo, could become Emperor. Heeding this advice, he returned to Hongkong and gained permission to return to Manila on one of Dewey's ships.

Again he joined the forces of the Filipino insurgents. Then it was that the claim was put forth in his behalf that he had accepted this sum of Spanish gold as a means of furthering the cause of the independence of the Filipinos. His course from that time on is current and familiar history. He became the head of the insurrection and of the so-called Philippine government. By whatsoever title he was called, no one will deny that he was in fact dictator. The so-called Philippine congress was but his subservient instrument to register his decrees. He was, in fact, the supreme dictator in a small oligarchy, which held, as in the hollow of their hands, the destinies of the Philippine people.

If, after our treaty with Spain had been entered into, we had yielded the sovereignty of these islands and withdrawn our forces from them, if no other nation had intervened, then whatever of government would have been established in the Philippine Islands would have been under the absolute control and dictatorship of Aguinaldo. It would have been a government of the approximately 80 tribes constituting the people of the Philippine Islands by the Tagalog tribe, and the government of the Tagalog tribe by Aguinaldo in fact.

Where, in this broad land of ours, is there to be found the intelligent lover of liberty—the man who grasps to its full extent the meaning of liberty, the humanitarian, the lover of peace, the man imbued with the Christian sense of charity, the man desiring and laboring for the upbuilding of mankind—who believes that such a government, formed under such environments, would have been for the best interests of the people of the Philippine Islands? Instead of liberty, despotism would have reigned. The wheels of progress would not have turned. The barbarous tribes of the islands would have remained barbarous. The civilizing and enlightening influences of the world would have been shut out, and the advance of Christian civilization and intellectual development of the world would have been retarded until, in the evolution of conditions in the world, these people had been rescued from their state and condition by some more enlightened nation of the world.

If the people of the United States organize and establish a government in the Philippine Islands, what will be the character of that government? What kind of a government is it possible for the people of the United States to establish anywhere? Whatever knowledge from a scholastic standpoint the people of the United States may have in the various forms of government of the earth, yet so imbued with the republican form of government are we that it would be impossible for us to establish any other form of government anywhere under any circumstances. It matters not what political party of the United States may for the time being be in the ascendency, whether the Administration be Republican or Democratic, the duty devolving upon the Administration to form a government in the Philippine Islands can result in nothing but a republican form of government.

So thoroughly are the people of the United States imbued with the principles of a republic that we could no more establish any other form of government elsewhere over any territory of which we may become possessed than we could tolerate any other form of government here. Almost immediately and before the insurrection in the Philippine Islands is entirely subdued, in our provisional government and in the government proposed by this bill, the forms of an embryo republic were being observed. Order was restored, sanitary conditions improved, protection of life and property observed; the habits, wishes, characteristics, and conditions of the people taken into account and as far as possible respected; the weak protected against the strong, executive officers selected from among the people, proper systems corresponding to our own in collecting revenues adopted, governmental functions economically administered, systems of education devised and fostered; schoolhouses built, teachers employed, the rights of individuals taught and protected; religious freedom respected and protected, the spirit of a just and true liberty inculcated, and the inalienable rights of life, liberty, the enjoyment of property, and the pursuit of happiness taught, fostered, and protected everywhere. When in the treaty of Paris the United States refused to turn back to the control of Spain the Philippine Islands, we showed our sense of duty, obligation to, and protection of these people.

When we paid Spain $20,000,000 for these islands, we showed our appreciation of the rights of the Spanish people. We recognized the value of public improvements in these islands made by the Spanish people. We proclaimed to the world our sense of justice and showed ourselves capable of being just and fair to a vanquished foe. When the more intelligent portion of the Philippine people saw that we at once protected them from the malignant influences of Spanish dominion, protected them from the tyranny of the Spanish Government and yet dealt justly and fairly and honorably with a people whose power we had overthrown, and who were in no position to be other than suppliants at our feet, these more intelligent Filipinos saw at once not only that they could trust the people of the United States, but that their best interests were to be subserved by not only submitting to, but in gladly accepting the sovereignty of the United States and a government established by our people. They beheld a new conception of liberty—a new conception of government.

The less intelligent portion of the Filipino people could not understand it. When our Army took prisoners the armed Filipino insurgents, they expected death. When their wounds were dressed, their sickness cured—when they were fed and clothed, and their liberty restored—they did not understand it. They had no real, true appreciation or understanding of the American conception of liberty and justice. They could not attribute it to a sense of honor and justice. They interpreted it to be the result of a fear. At first a fear of the Filipinos themselves, and it made them arrogant, bold, and cruel toward the American soldiers. When it became necessary to make them feel the strong arm of the American Army, and a campaign was organized that routed them at every turn, they changed their opinion of the Americans.

They no longer thought the American soldiers to be in fear of the Filipinos, yet they could not and did not grasp the idea of the spirit of the liberty and justice of the American people. They concluded that we were afraid of somebody or something, they knew not whom or what. They admitted the bravery of the American Army, but they did not comprehend the spirit of the government to be established. But more recently they are coming to catch the spirit of fair play, of justice, of humanity, of kindness, of helpfulness that the American policy in the Philippine Islands is slowly but surely teaching them. Nearly all of the real leaders of the Filipino people have accepted American sovereignty. Overcome by the sense of good that is to follow and is following in the wake of American influences, they are advising their people that it is for their own best good to accept American sovereignty, American policies, and American ideas of justice and liberty.

Does any man doubt that in a government of the Philippine Islands, established and maintained by the United States, that the people will be protected in their lives, their liberty, their property, and their religious freedom? Does anyone doubt that the schoolmaster is already there, and that more of them will go, and that education will become general and in time universal; that civilization will advance and that a new and higher conception of morality, justice, and liberty will be taught these people? Does anyone doubt that in any government established by the people of the United States that education of these people will be fostered; that the revenues of these islands will be honestly and properly collected, and that they will be expended in the interests of and for the benefit of the people of these islands?

Does anyone doubt that the affairs of government will be economically administered, and that as fast as prudence will permit, good sense suggest, and reasonable care allow, that the people of these islands will administer the affairs of their own government; that, in truth and in fact, this government will be a republic, notwithstanding the fact that the sovereignty of these people will be held and maintained by the people of the United States? That fact will redound to their own protection. Every administrative feature of the government will in time be administered by their own people, by officers selected by themselves, held responsible by the strong arm of the American Republic for a just, an honest, an economical, and a prudent administration of public affairs in the interests of the people themselves. In establishing a government such as I have predicted are we doing violence and wrong to a people whose condition was such that if we had not done this a government by Aguinaldo, in the manner that I have suggested, would have been established? Any hysterical plea, falsely made in the name of liberty, shall not prevent this Republic from giving to the people of the Philippine Islands a real liberty, a government established in the interests of justice and humanity instead of one of tyranny in fact, yet constructed in the name of liberty by Aguinaldo and his followers.

In considering this question from the standpoint of the American citizen, numerous factors and conditions must be taken into account. Simply to say that war is expensive or that it costs us much to carry on war, and stop at this, is to fail utterly in a proper consideration of the question. To consider the question first from a commercial standpoint, let us take into consideration some existing facts and figures.

In 1890 the people of the United States consumed 6.09 bushels of wheat per capita. In 1894 these same people consumed 3.44 bushels of wheat per capita, or an underconsumption of wheat for 1894 as compared with 1890 of 2.65 bushels per capita. The population in 1894, estimated at something over 67,000,000 of people, shows an underconsumption of wheat for 1894 as compared with 1890 of more than 175,000,000 bushels.

In 1890 the consumption of corn in the United States was 32.09 bushels per capita. In 1894 the consumption of corn was 22.96 bushels per capita, or an underconsumption for 1894 as compared with 1890 of 9.13 bushels per capita. Again estimating the population at something over 67,000,000 of people, the underconsumption of corn for the year 1894 as compared with the year 1890 was over 600,000,000 bushels. In 1895 the consumption of corn in the United States was only 17.18 bushels per capita, an underconsumption as compared with 1890 of 14.91 bushels per capita, making a total underconsumption of corn for the year 1895 as compared with the year 1890 of over 1,000,000,000 bushels in the United States. The great depression in business from 1893 to 1897 as it bore upon the farming industry of our country can at least be partially measured by these figures. The idleness of manufacturing institutions, the inactivity of the railroads, the shutting down of the coal mines, in short, the idle condition of labor and the low wages paid to labor, contributed to this great underconsumption of food products and in a large measure destroyed the home market for the farm, thus emphasizing most vividly the necessity of extended markets for the farm.

I desire to call attention to a few comprehensive figures, indicating the condition of our country, from which conclusions of the greatest importance to the people of the United States may be drawn. In 1890 there were 239 cotton factories in the South, operating 1,554,000 spindles, representing a capital investment of about $54,000,000. In 1900 there were 395 cotton factories in the South, operating 4,233,000 spindles and representing a capital investment of $123,000,000. The value of the product of these factories in 1890 was estimated at $42,000,000; in 1900 at $94,000,000. The number of wage-earners in these factories in 1890 was 37,000, who received in wages about $8,000,000. In 1900 the number of wage-earners in these factories was about 96,000, and they received in wages something over $17,000,000.

In 1890 the value of the products of the manufacturing and mechanical industries of all kinds in the United States was placed at $4,603,000,000, while in 1900 it is placed at $6,118,000,000, or an increase during the decade of $1,515,000,000, or about 33 per cent. The amount of capital invested in these manufacturing industries in 1890 was $3,782,000,000, while in 1900 it was $5,435,000,000, or an increase of capital invested in manufacturing during the decade of $1,653,000,000, or nearly 44 per cent. In 1890 the average number of wage-earners employed in manufacturing industries of the United States was 1,924,000, and their wages amounted to $786,000,000, while in 1900 the number of wage-earners was 2,307,000, and their wages amounted to $973,000,000.

In 1890, according to the census returns, the total value of the agricultural products of the United States amounted to $4,739,000,000. On June 1, 1900, the total value of farm property, embracing land improvements, buildings, implements, and machinery and live stock, amounted to $20,514,000,000. The value of land improvements was $13,115,000,000; that of the buildings, $3,560,000,000; that of the implements and machinery, $761,000,000, and that of the live stock $3,078,000,000, while in 1890 the total value of farm property comprised in these four items amounted to $15,982,000,000. The value of farm products for the year 1889, as shown by the census of 1890, is $2,460,000,000, but it is generally conceded that this estimate is much too low, and accordingly no fair figures exist upon which to make comparison for the years 1889 and 1899 of the total value of farm products in the United States.

We exported for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, products to the total value of $1,460,462,806, of which amount $951,628,331 was agricultural products. The remainder of $508,834,475 was the product of the factory, of the mine, of the forest, and of the fisheries. The annual average of total exports for five years from 1895 to 1899, inclusive, for the United States is $1,136,000,000, of which $752,000,000 is agricultural products. For the same period exports from the United Kingdom were $1,166,000,000, of which $78,000,000 was agricultural products; Germany $878,000,000, of which the agricultural products was $181,000,000; France $696,000,000, of which $258,000,000 was agricultural products; the Netherlands $567,000,000, of which $263,000,000 was agricultural products; Russia $349,000,000, of which $295,000,000 was agricultural products; Austria-Hungary $326,000,000, of which $131,000,000 was agricultural products; Australasia $361,000,000, of which $213,000,000 was agricultural products; Italy $224,000,000, of which $131,000,000 was agricultural products.

The total imports into the United States for the year ending June 30, 1901, was $823,000,000, of which $392,000,000 was agricultural products, $314,000,000 manufactured products, and the balance from the forests, mines, and fisheries.

I desire also to invite attention to a few additional facts and figures pertaining to the cotton industry of the United States. For the year ending June 30, 1890, we exported to Asia 841,959 pounds of raw cotton, valued at $85,211. For the year ending June 30, 1900, we exported to the same place 168,009,168 pounds of raw cotton, valued at $13,228,269. Of cotton manufactures we exported to Asia for the year 1890 products valued at $1,730,610, and for the year ending June 30, 1900, the same products to the value of $11,064,629, and to Oceania for the year ending June 30, 1890, products valued at $551,006, and for the year ending June 30, 1900, the same products valued at $1,297,693, or a total value of manufactured cotton goods in 1890 to Asia and Oceania of $2,281,616, and of the same products for the year ending June 30, 1900, $12,362,322, or, stated differently, for the year ending June 30, 1890, raw cotton and manufactured cotton to Asia and Oceania to the value of $2,366,827, and for the year ending June 30, 1900, $25,590,591, or an increase of nearly 1,000 per cent.

Nothwithstanding the development of our country, and the volume of business being done as partially indicated by these figures, we can not draw safe conclusions without taking into account our possibilities of continuing this development. Iron and coal are the essential bases for much of our manufacturing. Of coal England has left only 12,000 square miles, Germany about 2,000 square miles, the United States over 200,000 square miles. In the year 1900, according to the Geological Survey, the United States produced 241,000,000 long tons of coal, Great Britain 225,000,000 long tons, and Germany 147,000,000 long tons. The total production for the world in 1900 was estimated at 754,000,000 long tons. The export of coal from the United States for the year ending June 30, 1901, was 7,675,549 long tons, with a value of $22,317,496. The United Kingdom exported during the calendar year 1900 44,089,000 long tons, valued at $177,187,000, and Germany, during the same calendar year, exported 15,086,000 long tons, valued at $51,732,000.

England and Germany, looking to their future interests, are today discouraging the exporting of coal. The United States may reasonably anticipate in the comparatively near future an increased export of coal worth from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 annually. In the calendar year 1900 the United States produced 27,553,000 long tons of iron ore, while Great Britain produced in the same year 14,028,000 long tons and Germany 18,665,000 long tons. During the fiscal year 1901 the United States exported iron and steel to the value of $32,160,750 and manufactures of iron and steel to the value of $85,158,570. In the calendar year 1900 the United Kingdom exported iron and steel to the value of $122,160,000 and manufactures of iron and steel to the value of $183,421,000, while Germany exported iron and steel to the value of $38,313,000 and manufactures of iron and steel to the value of $135,546,000.

Taking all of our productions of all kinds into consideration, we have been increasing in production faster than England, Germany, and France combined, and are to-day moving forward in that comparative rate. Mulhall, the great English statistician, estimates the average value of the production of the European workman, averaging all of Europe, at about $450 per capita. In 1890 the average value of the American workman in all of the manufacturing and industrial arts was but a trifle under $2,400, while in 1900 the average value of the production of these American workmen was a little more than $2,650. The increase in agricultural products for the year 1900 can fairly be stated to be $750,000,000 in value in excess of the value of the farm products for 1890. These figures, however, on the increase in the farm products are but an approximation, the data not being at hand for exactness. In manufacturing institutions the number of wage-earners has increased from 1890 to 1900 about 20 per cent; the volume of capital invested has increased about 44 per cent, and the value of the product has increased about 33 per cent.

As I have already stated, the total value of our imports for the year ending June 30, 1901, is $823,000,000, while the total value of our exports is $1,460,000,000, the excess of exports over imports being $637,000,000.

While we are increasing in our production faster than any other nation in the world, yet we are not the only nation that is increasing in its production. The principal European countries are developing and increasing their production, and are having more of the product of labor and capital to put upon the markets of the world year by year. What is to become of this surplus product of the more highly enlightened nations of the earth? Conditions in the world point unerringly to Asia as the future great market place for the surplus products of the more enlightened nations of the world. Less than twenty years ago the total value of imports into Japan did not exceed 50 cents per capita of her population.

The doors of Japan were opened to the influences of Western civilization, and one of the direct results has been that Japan is to-day importing into her country about $6 in value per capita of her population. If the same influences that produced this result in Japan will produce a similar result in China, then there will be opened in China in the comparatively near future an annual market of $2,500,000,000 for the surplus products of the more greatly developed and progressive countries of the world. European statesmen are recognizing and taking cognizance of this condition of affairs. England, France, Germany, Russia, and Italy have been forcing an entry into China. They have entered different portions of China, and, having acquired some species of settlements or possession of some port, have at once laid claim to a portion of China which they have denominated their sphere of interests or their sphere of influence. What do these countries, or any of them, want with a sphere of influence in China? What is the nature of the influence or interest that these different countries claim in China, and what is its significance?

Recognizing Asia as the future market place of the world, they have been trying to establish some species of rights in some portion of China, which means simply that they are trying to control the markets of a portion of China for the benefit of the people of their respective countries. England, with her extensive manufacturing interests, contended for the open-door policy. Russia was undoubtedly the strongest opponent of that policy. She has been England's rival in the East, and having in mind the future of her own people, was an opponent of the open-door policy of trade. France, allied with Russia offensively and defensively, and having a portion of China in which her influence was to be supreme, or, in other words, in which she was to control the markets, acquiesced in Russia's policy.

Germany, having her sphere of influence, was at least passive, and offered no obstacle to the policy of Russia. Italy, too, was having her sphere of influence, and was therefore passive in the struggle. It is a well-known fact that in 1898, while England had not abandoned the open-door policy, she had nevertheless practically ceased opposition to the more aggressive policy of Russia, and the commercial division and partition of China was well-nigh an accomplished fact. While Russia, and Germany, and France, and Italy, and England were each having their sphere of influence in China the United States and her people were being ignored, and the great benefit of this great future market was being taken from her.

At that moment a crisis in the affairs of the world developed; an effete monarchy of Europe, holding possession of Cuba by right of discovery, had so misgoverned and mismanaged the affairs of those people, had so oppressed and robbed them, that the people of the United States, practically as one man, rose up and demanded that we should drive Spain from this continent and put an end to the miseries of Cuba. We declared war upon Spain. All of us expected the scene of war to be in Cuba, but we had an old fifth-grade squadron of the American fleet stationed in Asiatic waters; Spain had a squadron or a fleet in Manila Harbor. Our little squadron was in command of a valiant and intrepid sailor, and upon orders from President McKinley Dewey sailed into Manila Bay, and on that memorable 1st day of May destroyed the Spanish fleet and practically took by force of arms the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands from Spain. It was not a premeditated act to obtain the sovereignty of these islands. It was but an act of war to break down and destroy the forces of an enemy.

But notwithstanding want of premeditation on the part of the United States, we had supplanted Spain in her right to the Philippine Islands. We had conquered them from her. The treaty of peace followed, and the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands was formally ceded to the United States. This act gave this nation of ours, as viewed from the standpoint of international comity, no less than in fact, the right to a voice in affairs in the East. President McKinley, with unerring judgment, saw the advantage that was to come to the American people in the future by having rights in the East which gave us the opportunity for a voice in affairs there. One by one our war ships were quietly sent to the Philippine Islands, until presently it came to pass that we were stronger in our fighting machinery in Asiatic waters than any other nation in the world.

Our little Navy had given two exhibitions of her prowess which were object lessons to the world. Then it was that President McKinley directed the Secretary of State to take up with the European nations the question of the open-door policy of trade in China. In September, 1899, our Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, communicated through our ambassadors with the Governments of Russia, Germany, France, England, and Italy, making known to these countries that we claimed a voice in the affairs of the East and insisted upon the open-door policy of trade in China. Communications passed back and forth diplomatically between the United States and each of these countries; one by one they saw the justice of the demands of the United States, and one by one they gave written and signed statements accepting and acquiescing in the open-door policy of trade for China, until finally, on March 20, 1900, our Secretary of State sent his notice to the Governments at London, Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Rome, and Tokyo notifying each Government of the acceptance by the others of the open-door policy of trade.

England hailed this achievement, in the accomplishment of which she had failed, with delight, and the world recognized the greatest achievement of modern diplomacy. Thus was broken up the so-called spheres of influence of the different European countries in China; thus was prevented the commercial division and partition of China, and thus was preserved to the people of the United States an equal advantage and equal opportunity in this future great market for the world's products. This great benefit to the commercial interests of the people of the United States was made possible by the fact that we had possessions in the East and therefore had the right to a voice in this matter.

With our great surplus production in this country and its increasing development, where would we have found a market place for it in the future if we had not seized this opportunity and secured this open-door policy of trade in the Orient? If we fail for any reason in a market place, then our advancement in commercial development must cease. Already we have a large surplus in excess of our home demands. Whenever the day comes that our manufacturing institutions must suspend operations, then will the wage-earners become idle either all or a part of the time. When that day comes, then will there be great depression in business. When that day comes the home market for the farmer will be partially destroyed. Already we have a surplus of over $900,000,000 in farm products. Let industrial depression come for want of a market for its output and down will go the price of farm products. In short, stagnation will be everywhere followed by inevitable suffering and distress of the people, and this wonderful development and progress that has come to our people and that has marked us as the most wonderful nation in the world will be a thing of the past. We must hold fast these opportunities with an iron hand, as we value the prosperity, the comfort, and the happiness of our own people.

But says some one: This commercial spirit is not patriotism; this desire for wealth and money making is beneath the dignity of a true patriot; that its influences are base and low. If this be true, then indeed has patriotism vanished from the world. For wherever civilization is greatest there in the most exalted degree is to be found the desire on the part of the whole people for this commercial activity and prosperity. Is it beneath the dignity and lofty patriotism of statesmen so to legislate and so to use the power and influence of a nation as that it will redound to the greatest good, to the greatest comfort, and the greatest happiness of their people?

Is it unpatriotic for the statesmen of the United States so to use the power of this great Government of ours as that the people of this country shall have equal opportunity and equal facilities for the full development of our country internally and an equal opportunity in the markets of the world for our surplus production? Patriotism is love of country, but love of country is love of the institutions of the country. The institutions of the country are inseparable from the policy of their management, and all are unworthy unless they conduce to the comfort, the happiness, and the prosperity of the people as a whole. Love of country not only implies love of her institutions, but love of that policy and management of her affairs that leads on to the prosperity and well-being of her people. A proper care for the financial prosperity of the people is one of the great elements of true patriotism and love of country. [Applause.]

I conclude, then, that we will give to the people of the Philippine Islands a better government than they are capable of giving themselves. We will protect the weak from the strong; we will establish a government that will administer justice, that will foster education, that will respect the religious faith of the people, that will give them a real liberty and protect them in it until they can protect themselves. We will do them no wrong, but in all we do there shall be constantly before us the upbuilding and bettering of their condition. We will not make them slaves nor will we let them enslave themselves. We will not let them run to tyranny and anarchy, but we will give them liberty and order. We will not be afraid of ourselves, but will give them, as provided in this proposed legislation, a bill of rights containing every limit of safety to the liberties of the people that civilization has devised up to this day. [Applause.]

While doing this for the Filipino people we will protect the interests of the people of the United States. We will take advantage of the opportunities which the God of Nature seems to have given to our people. We will do our share in the upbuilding of the people of the world. We will live up to the full measure of responsibility that duty, honor, justice, and patriotism shall demand of us. And does anybody think this work will stop? We are moving in a channel the current of which is irresistible. History, or at least archæology, justifies the belief that the white man first appeared in this world upon the eastern slopes of the Himalaya Mountains. He was then, as now, in disposition a traveler, a nomad. He climbed over the mountains and followed the setting sun, and when ages had passed the Roman Empire appeared.

When another great era had passed, the Roman Empire disappeared, and London, Liverpool, Berlin, and Paris became the great centers of commerce and human activity. And when another great era had passed this same white man crossed the Atlantic Ocean, and he builded cities upon the American continent and now has crossed the continent, carried his activity to the Pacific Ocean, and to-day, unconscious of it though we may be, we are in the midst of another great event. While we are here discussing what shall best be done for the people of the Philippine Islands, this same white man is just stepping across the Pacific Ocean and planting himself in eastern Asia, and it will be only a short time when he will have encircled the earth and be found again on the eastern slope of the Himalaya Mountains.

Wherever he has gone his civilization supersedes all others; the colored races of the world yield to him, and his civilization becomes their civilization. What has been the trouble in China in the last few years? We say it has been an uprising of the Boxers. But what does that signify? What does that mean? What was the real trouble in China? It was nothing more nor nothing less than the resistance of the old civilization of China against the advancing civilization of Europe and America. This younger, stronger, Christian civilization of Europe and America is knocking at the doors of China to-day, and the revolt that has been there is but the effort of resistance against the onward march of the Christian civilization of the world.

Will China successfully resist this civilization? Will it be stopped? That were impossible. Victor Hugo, writing of the battle of Waterloo, said, in substance, Wellington did not conquer Napoleon. That were impossible. It was the mighty hosts of the universe led on by the hand of an infinite God, for the change of front for the civilization of the nineteenth century. So say I to you to-day. The old civilization of China can not resist the younger, newer, stronger Christian civilization of Europe and America. It is the forces of the universe led on by the hand of an infinite God for the change of front for the civilization of the twentieth century. [Prolonged applause.] I am indebted to the Hon. Frank Hitchcock, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign Markets of the Department of Agriculture, for the preparation of the following tables:

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I have not had an opportunity better to prepare myself for this occasion. The House has before it two bills, one presented by the majority or Republicans of this House, which has for its purpose, although not so expressed, the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands. The minority have presented a bill which has for its purpose the retention of the Philippine Islands until a stable government can be formed, and then to leave those people to control and govern themselves, except at their request we would exercise a protectorate over them for a certain stated time.

These bills are before the House, and I undertake to say that every member who feels any interest in this matter has read those bills and the reports of the committee, and in all probability understands their purport as well as I would be able to explain this evening.

It is not my purpose to discuss these bills or their merits. That has already been done very ably on this side of the House and on the other side of the House, and other gentlemen who follow me will endeavor to give attention to these bills and their effect upon the Philippines and upon the United States. It is my purpose in part this evening to show to the House of Representatives and to the country why I think we ought not to retain these Philippine Islands permanently, and in doing so I think that any argument that goes to show how we obtained those islands and what they cost us and our conduct there, whatever it may have been, will have its bearing before the people of this country, who will finally determine the question as to whether we should retain the Philippine Islands permanently or not, for we will not settle this question here now, you may rest assured of that fact.

Now, there is one thing that I want to undertake to do this evening. I do want to relieve God Almighty of a part of the responsibility for that which has been thrust upon Him in the Philippine Islands by our Republican friends. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] You have, gentlemen, upon every stump and in every pulpit in this country tried to impress upon the people of the United States that you are doing the work of God in the Philippine Islands; that you were carried there by Him; and the gentleman who has just taken his seat said we were following our course around the world under the leadership of an all-wise God.

Now I want to say to you that I believe in my heart so long as we were fighting with old Spain that God Almighty was with us. It certainly looked so. But just as soon as we entered into the peace negotiations with the Spaniards it looked like God Almighty stepped out of the way and the devil stepped in and took possession of the job, and that he has been running it ever since. [Renewed laughter.] Now about our being in the Philippine Islands by Providence, that God Almighty put us down there, I want to say to you, and I expect to prove it by the record, that all the ingenuity of our statesmen and diplomats in connection with our treasure, were exercised in order to get hold of these Philippine Islands, and God Almighty had nothing to do with it. I say from all that I can see about it that we did all we could in order to grab these islands, instead of having them thrust upon us.

Now, in the first place, we started out to acquire those islands down there by the right of conquest. That was a failure, and we could not sustain that before the civilized world. Then we proposed to sustain ourselves by taking them on the ground of indemnity, and we could not sustain that proposition, or at least we did not do it before the civilized world; and then what next? Then there was the final argument, and one which the Republican party has denied, in fact, altogether, so far as I know, upon the ground of the obligation that we owed to our allies in the Philippine Islands; that we could not afford to turn them back to Spain—that is, upon our honor we could not afford to do so.

Now, you will understand when our commissioners first went to negotiate this treaty in Paris they were not instructed to take the archipelago or the Philippine Islands. Their instructions were to take the island of Luzon. But after they got there and entered into this negotiation a certain Englishman made his appearance upon the scene, like the devil, who took Christ up on a high mountain and showed him the richness of all the balance of the earth. This Englishman told the commissioners of the richness of the Philippine Islands and what we would get out of them if we would take them as colonies. Was there anything behind that?

Now, I do not know that there was, but this idea has always occurred to me. Old Briton was right then making arrangements to go out after the two little republics down in South Africa. She knew that so long as the United States lived up to her principles as she had done heretofore she would not be allowed to have her way with this colony, if we had not stained our hands with imperialism we could hold them off.

But they were anxious to get us in the colony business, then our mouths would be hushed forever, and she could go forward and thrash the life out of these little republics. Therefore, her agent was there painting the glories and the grandeur of the Philippines and inviting us to go forward; and our commissioners, not like Christ, who told the devil to get behind Him, just surrendered. The devil he went to work and took this whole business in charge; in other words, we put the devil in front.

I have here some papers that we were very anxious to get a little while before the late Presidential campaign, but they did not make their appearance until January 31, 1901, "injunction of secrecy removed." In other words, that is when we got them.

These are the instructions given by the President, and the correspondence, to some extent, between him and the commissioners in regard to this treaty between Spain and the United States. Now I want to read the instructions of the President to this commission in reference to the Philippine Islands, the question under discussion to-day.

The Philippines stand upon a different basis. It is none the less true, however, that, without any original thought of complete or even partial acquisition, the presence and success of our arms at Manila imposes upon us obligations which we can not disregard. The march of events rules and overrules human action. Avowing unreservedly the purpose which has animated all our effort, and still solicitous to adhere to it, we can not be unmindful that without any desire or design on our part the war has brought us new duties and responsibilities which we must meet and discharge as becomes a great nation on whose growth and career from the beginning the Ruler of nations has plainly written the high command and pledge of civilization.

Incidental to our tenure in the Philippines is the commercial opportunity to which American statesmanship can not be indifferent. It is just to use every legitimate means for the enlargement of American trade, but we seek no advantages in the Orient which are not common to all. Asking only the open door for ourselves, we are ready to accord the open door to others. The commercial opportunity which is naturally and inevitably associated with this new opening depends less on large territorial possessions than upon an adequate commercial basis and upon broad and equal privileges.

It is believed that in the practical application of these guiding principles the present interests of our country and the proper measure of its duty, its welfare in the future, and the consideration of its exemption from unknown perils will be found in full accord with the just, moral, and humane purpose which was invoked as our justification in accepting the war.

In view of what has been stated, the United States can not accept less than the cession in full right and sovereignty of the island of Luzon. It is desirable, however, that the United States shall acquire the right of entry for vessels and merchandise belonging to citizens of the United States into such ports of the Philippines as are not ceded to the United States upon terms of equal favor with Spanish ships and merchandise, both in relation to port and customs charges and rates of trade and commerce, together with other rights of protection and trade accorded to citizens of one country within the territory of another. You are therefore instructed to demand such concession, agreeing on your part that Spain shall have similar rights as to her subjects and vessels in the ports of any territory in the Philippines ceded to the United States.

These were the instructions on which our commissioners went forward and negotiated, as far as the Philippines were concerned. Now, I have stated that the first proposition upon which this Government proposed to acquire the islands was upon the right of conquest. Now, I want to read you what Mr. Day reported to the President on that line. This is dated Paris, November 3, 1898, for the President especially:

UNITED STATES PEACE COMMISSION,
Paris, November 3, 1898—10 a. m.

After a careful examination of the authorities, the majority of the Commission are clearly of opinion that our demand for the Philippine Islands can not be based on conquest. When the protocol was signed Manila was not captured, siege was in progress and capture made after the execution of the protocol.

Captures made after agreement for armistice must be disregarded, and status quo restored as far as practicable. We can require cession of Philippine Islands only as indemnity for losses and expenses of the war. Have in view, also, condition of islands, the broken power of Spain, anarchy in which our withdrawal would leave the islands, etc. These are legitimate factors. Have written fully.

Thursday, 11.30 morning.

DAY.

So, you see, the idea of our acquiring the islands by conquest failed. After an examination of the authorities, our commissioners came to the deliberate conclusion that we could not hold the islands on the idea of conquest alone, or if at all.

So they received further instructions:

Mr. Hay to Mr. Day.

WASHINGTON, November 13, 1898.

A treaty of peace is of the highest importance to the United States if it can be had without the sacrifice of plain duty. The President would regret deeply the resumption of hostilities against a prostrate foe. We are clearly entitled to indemnity for the cost of the war. We can not hope to be fully indemnified. We do not expect to be. It would probably be difficult for Spain to pay money. All she has are the archipelagoes of the Philippines and the Carolines. She surely can not expect us to turn the Philippines back and bear the cost of the war and all claims of our citizens for damages to life and property in Cuba without any indemnity but Porto Rico, which we have and which is wholly inadequate.

Does Spain propose to pay in money the cost of the war and the claims of our citizens, and make full guaranties to the people of the Philippines, and grant to us concessions of naval and telegraph stations in the islands, and privileges to our commerce the same as enjoyed by herself rather than surrender the archipelago? From the standpoint of indemnity both the archipelagoes are insufficient to pay our war expenses, but aside from this do we not owe an obligation to the people of the Philippines which will not permit us to return them to the sovereignty of Spain? Could we justify ourselves in such a course or could we permit their barter to some other power? Willing or not, we have the responsibility of duty which we can not escape.

They have discovered now that we owe something to the people of the Philippines. We started out on the idea of conquest or an indemnity, and we could not sustain ourselves before the civilized world. Now we have discovered that we owe some obligation to these people who reside in the Philippine Islands.

So the President directs:

You are therefore instructed to insist upon the cession of the whole of Philippines, and, if necessary, pay to Spain ten to twenty millions of dollars, and if you can get cession of a naval and telegraph station in the Carolines, and the several concessions and privileges and guaranties, so far as applicable, enumerated in the views of Commissioners FRYE and Reid, you can offer more. The President can not believe any division of the archipelago can bring us anything but embarrassment in the future.

Now, you understand that we started out on the idea that we were entitled to these islands by reason of conquest. In addition to that, we urged that we were entitled to them as an indemnity. The question of duty that we owed the Philippines was not suggested until these two claims failed—entirely failed—and then it was that we discovered that we owed something to the people in the Philippine Islands. So the President directed as follows:

The trade and commercial side, as well as the indemnity for the cost of the war, are questions we might yield. They might be waived or compromised, but the questions of duty and humanity appeal to the President so strongly that he can find no appropriate answer but the one he has here marked out. You have the largest liberty to lead up to these instructions, but unreasonable delay should be avoided.

HAY.

What was this question of duty? What duty and to whom were we indebted? If we had no right to acquire these islands by conquest, if we had no right to acquire them by indemnity, then the question is, To whom did we owe this duty? Unquestionably to Aguinaldo, whom the gentleman a few minutes ago in his speech, as I have heard time and time again on that side, described as a traitor to his country and to his people. I want to say to you that if Aguinaldo is a traitor, as he has been depicted by your people, it is a fact established in this record of our peace negotiations that our consuls hurried all over that Eastern country to find him and employ him and send him to aid our Navy. They sent him into the islands and armed his people, and they aided us to drive the Spaniards up to the gates of Manila.

And not only that, the gentleman spoke of the $400,000 he had received. I undertake to say that within the lids of this book, among the official records, you will find the statement that our consul-general at Manila, Mr. Williams, attested a check himself on the Bank of Hongkong for $400,000, which Aguinaldo had received as a compromise with his Spanish enemies in order that his people might have certain reforms which they had never brought about; that that $400,000 was held as a sacred fund and was never drawn out of that bank until this war began, and then it was drawn out and invested in rifles in order to aid the United States and themselves in putting down the Spanish authority in the Philippines. The record shows these facts.

Now, with these instructions, what did our commissioners do? What did they say? We have had a good deal said in this country through the newspapers, and especially on the floor of this House and at the other end of this Capitol, about what transpired and about the motives and so forth which induced our people to acquire the Philippine Islands. I say to you gentlemen this is the official record. These commissioners were speaking for the United States and for the Administration. Now, let us see what they said. What is our attitude toward these people? It has been denied from every stump by the Republicans of this country that these Philippine people were ever our allies. You have denied it. I have heard it denied time and again on this floor and elsewhere.

I say to you that they were recognized as such. We owed those people of the Philippine Islands a duty—an obligation, as our commissioners said—to stand by them. They did not intend to establish the relation of allies. But I will let them speak for themselves. Here is what they said in their final ultimatum to the Spanish Government on this question:

Even if the United States were disposed to permit Spanish sovereignty to remain over the Philippines, and to leave to Spain the restoration of peace and order in the islands, could it now in honor do so? The Spanish commissioners have themselves, in an earlier stage of these negotiations, spoke of the Filipinos as our allies. This is not a relation which the Government of the United States intended to establish; but it must at least be admitted that the insurgent chiefs returned and resumed their activity with the consent of our military and naval commanders, who permitted them to arm with weapons which we had captured from the Spaniards, and assured them of fair treatment and justice. Should we be justified in now surrendering these people to the Government of Spain, even under a promise of amnesty, which we know they would not accept?

These were the commissioners who represented the United States and the Administration—

Should we be justified in now surrendering these people to the Government of Spain, even under a promise of amnesty, which they would not accept?

Gentlemen, every other argument had been exhausted; and then it was that they discovered that these people were our allies. They did not intend to form that connection, but taking the least that they say of it, it is that they did return at our suggestion; they were armed with guns that we captured from the Spaniards; they did aid us; and we can not afford to turn our backs on them.

So I assert that as a last resort these commissioners obtained the Philippine Islands upon the idea of a duty that we owed to the people, after they had exhausted every other remedy, every other method by which they could acquire these islands.

Yet our Republican friends are going up and down this country and insisting on every stump that God Almighty placed those people in our hands. All you have to do is to read these proceedings to see that the ingenuity of the diplomat was absolutely exhausted in order to acquire these islands in a way that we could justify before the world. Now, gentlemen, what have we done to those people to whom we owe so much? We have acquired these islands, according to this record, because of a duty and an obligation that we owed to the people of the Philippines—those people who assisted us when we had no infantry in that country—who came to the rescue of Dewey. What have we done for them?

Why, history will answer that question. I do not care to go into it. I do not expect to stand here and criticise what our soldiers have done down in the Philippine Islands. I was once a soldier myself. I know what soldiers do. I know that private soldiers can commit crimes as easily as private citizens and are more liable to do so, and that the Government is not responsible for such conduct. But I will undertake to say that there has been no act of cruelty perpetrated out there by the orders of any of our commanding officers that was not fully justified by the orders that they received from the Administration in the city of Washington. I do not believe that our troops and our officers would violate the rules of war without such orders.

Now, have I a right to say this? Why, sir, take these charges that have been made against General Smith, who left the island of Samar "a howling wilderness." Does he deny the charges that are made? I have here those charges, and I propose to print them as a part of my speech. He absolutely comes into court and admits these charges and says they are true, and justifies himself by the order, or, in other words, by the rules of war. Has any one of them been convicted? There has been a good deal said about punishing these people for their cruelties inflicted down in the Philippine Islands. A number of arrests have been made, a number of courts-martial have been held, and every single one of them up to date, so far as I remember, has been acquitted. So that leads me to the conclusion that these people were acting under orders and those orders were sent out from the Department, from the commander, the Secretary of War.

But the Secretary of War has furnished us the expense account down in the Philippines—$170,000,000. I would just like to see that statement and see how he juggled those figures to bring that about. It transpired a little while back, a few days ago, that he thought it was necessary to expend some of the trust fund down in Cuba to educate the best thought in this country on this question of reciprocity. Well, if it cost only $170,000,000 to carry on this war for the last four years in the Philippines, I should like to know what became of all this money that we have been appropriating here for our Army. If he can take trust funds and circulate them through the country for the purpose of educating the best thought on one side, he may have been doing something of the sort with some of these vast appropriations that we have been making for the Army, which do not seem to have been expended in the Philippines. I do not make that charge, but it is up to him to say what became of all this money. I have made some figures on that myself. I do not claim them to be accurate, for no man on earth can tell except the man who has the books in charge.

Accurate and complete statistics in regard to governmental matters in the Philippines are obtainable only down to the end of the fiscal year terminating June 30, 1901. The various departments of the Government are either unable or unwilling to furnish statistics for the present fiscal year. This statement that I have here was prepared the day before yesterday, before this report came out. Figures for the present fiscal year, however, can be stated with approximate correctness by making an informal comparison with those of the preceding year. During the three years beginning June 30, 1898, and ending June 30, 1901, the total number of American soldiers engaged in the Philippines was 112,277. During the same period the total number of our soldiers killed and died of injuries received in battle was 918, the number of deaths from disease contracted in the Philippine service was 2,075, making the total number of deaths 3,493.

In addition, during the same period the number discharged for disability contracted in the same service was about 4,000, and of this number about 500 were discharged or incapacitated by reason of their sufferings in the service. In regard to the present fiscal year, approximate figures are available down to December, 1901. During the period of the first five months of the present fiscal year the average number of soldiers on duty in the Philippines was about 46,000, and the number of deaths was 335. Well, now, just let us stop right there. The Secretary of War comes here with a report, and he says for the year 1898—the two months of May and June—the cost was two million and something; for the fiscal year 1899 twenty-six million and odd; for the fiscal year of 1900 fifty million, and for 1901 fifty-five million. I have always understood that it cost about $1,000 to maintain every soldier in this country. That has been admitted, and 40 per cent additional is added to maintain a soldier in the Philippine Islands.

At one time we had probably as great an army as was ever gathered together almost in any country, except during the civil war, in the Philippine Islands, and yet we are told here that this expense, even the highest year, was only something over $55,000,000 for the payment of those troops. Now, how were those figures juggled with in order to bring about this result? I do not know from what standpoint he is figuring. I can not imagine. We have got to have some other explanation of his report, I believe, before the country will be willing to accept it. I am very loath, in fact I never have before in my life attempted to criticise any officer of this Government, but it does seem to me that this report ought to be sustained by an itemized statement and the facts brought out, if it is not the truth.

As I was saying, during the first five months of the present fiscal year the average number of soldiers on duty in the Philippines was about 46,000, and the number of deaths was 338. The average number of cases of sickness during that period was about 3,500 at any given time. Since the commencement of the present calendar year, the number of soldiers on duty in the Philippines has been somewhat reduced, and is now about 40,000. Further reductions are promised, but nothing under 30,000 is expected in any quarter so long as the present hostilities are maintained. The total expense involved in the prosecution of the military and naval operations since the outbreak of the Spanish war is not generally undersood or appreciated, and the Philippine war business has already cost the country nearly half as much as the total expense to the North of the whole civil war.

The civil war cost the North something more than $2,000,000,000. The expense involved in the Spanish war and in the subsequent Philippine operations has already exceeded $1,000,000,000. The people at large do not realize this. If they did, they would call a halt. The total cost of the Spanish war up to the date of the treaty, as estimated by the House Appropriations Committee, $482,562,000; total cost of military operations in the Philippines for three years ending June 30, 1901, according to the best estimates, $446,000,000; estimate of same operations for present fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, about $100,000,000; total war expenses, $1,028,562,000.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. What do I understand the gentleman to say that the cost of the civil war was?

Mr. MADDOX. Over $2,000,000,000.

Mr. PALMER. I thought it cost over $7,000,000,000.

Mr. MADDOX. The estimate for the same operations for the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1902, is about $100,000,000. The total war expenses are thus $1,028,562.

The cost of the Army before the Spanish war was about $30,000,000 a year. It is now over $100,000,000 a year. The amount for the present year has been about $113,000,000. Deduct the $30,000,000 that was formerly the normal cost of the Army and we have $83,000,000 left, which is almost entirely devoted to the expense of the military occupation of the Philippines. This is simply for maintenance, and does not include transportation. Add the transportation expenses, and the total Philippine military expenses will foot up nearly $100,000,000 annually. Owing to the recent contemplated reductions, the amount during the coming year will be probably about $15,000,000 less.

If I understand the orders that have been issued recently, this sum should be reduced below that, for I understand it is the intention of the War Department to withdraw the troops from the Philippines to a greater extent than was anticipated by myself.

But so long as the hostilities continue there can be no further reduction than this. In other words, the annual continuing expense of the military occupation of the Philippines, including transportation, can not be less than $85,000,000.

Now add to this the cost of maintaining the civil government. The Philippine Commission, although one of the most expensive and elaborate and extravagant governmental bodies in the world, of course does not compare in expensiveness with the Army, because it is not as numerous. However, it is found that in the fiscal year 1899 the cost of the Commission reached, in round numbers, $2,300,000; that in the fiscal year 1900 this amount was swelled to about $4,500,000, and that in the fiscal year 1901 it amounted to the very respectable sum of about $5,200,000. This included something over $1,000,000 for "administration," including salaries, and the remainder went for schools, police, prisons, sanitation, roads, bridges, quarantine, supplies, hospitals, and public works of all sorts. The total civil expenditures for the year, including customs and postal, was, in round numbers, $5,652,000.

Now, what is the other side of the balance sheet? The total commerce of the Philippines, both imports and exports, for the last fiscal year was, in round numbers, $53,000,000; of which the share of the United States was about $6,000,000. And fully one-quarter of this sum consisted of exports from this country directly to our soldiers in the Philippines. In other words, our commerce with the Philippines proper amounts to not more than $4,000,000 or $4,500,000 annually, both exports and imports; and, calculating upon a basis of 10 per cent profit on this commerce, our merchants and others make perhaps $500,000 at the outside out of our Philippine trade, to count as an offset against $100,000,000, which the islands are costing us annually.

It is said that our commerce with the islands is increasing. So it appears to be, at the rate of perhaps 10 per cent to 15 per cent annually, including our exports to the Army. Deducting these, the increase has been very slight.

Supposing that such increase is at the rate of 5 per cent annually, the increase in the profit of the United States in its Philippine commerce would amount to about $25,000 next year, and at this rate it can be calculated that the United States would catch up with its Philippine expenditures, perhaps, some time in the course of the millennium.

Remember, too, that the profits of the commerce, meager as they are, would go only to a few exporters and other business men, while the enormous expenditures are borne by the whole people, who, with rare exceptions, get no profit whatever from our Philippine possessions, and can never expect to do so.

Aside from the few business men engaged in the Philippine trade, the only money to be gotten out of the Philippines will go to the Army, the civil government of the islands, and the few exploiters and promoters who are even now rushing over the ocean to gobble up the whole islands.

Say the Philippines are costing us $100,000,000 a year—that is, $273,972 per day. The civil war cost the North at the rate of a little over $1,000,000 a day. So this Philippine business is costing us nearly one-third as much as the civil war cost the North.

Notice the great increase in the totals of our recent national appropriations. In 1897 these amounted to, in round numbers, $470,000,000; in 1901, $710,000,000; in 1902, $720,000,000; and for 1903 they will amount to at least $800,000,000. These recent great increases have been due almost entirely to this Philippine business.

I have some other figures here in reference to the report made by the Secretary of War, which I will not take the trouble now to read, but which I shall incorporate in my remarks.

The question simply brings itself down to this proposition: If Secretary Root's figures really represent the total expenses of the Philippine war, including maintenance of the Army during the past four years, what has he done with all the rest of the money included in the recent Army appropriation bills? Let him answer that. For example, during the fiscal year 1901–2 he says the Philippine army expenses have been only about $40,000,000. But the Army appropriation bill for that year named $115,000,000. What has he done with the odd $75,000,000? Now, that is the question for the Secretary to answer. What has become of this extra $75,000,000? If not expended in the Philippines, where has it been expended?

I noticed in his report, if I understood it, that he undertook to say that the regular standing Army now being 59,000 men, we only ought to count or charge the expenses of the additional troops beyond the minimum sum of the Regular Army that is now in the service. But what is to become of the President's message to this Congress and of the speeches urging the necessity for the increase of this Regular Army in order to maintain ourselves in the Philippine Islands to 100,000 troops? What necessity did we have for increasing the standing Army except for the purpose of sending those troops to the Philippine Islands? So long as we did not have the Philippine Islands, what use would we have for more than 25,000 men, the maximum, or nearly so, prior to 1897?

Now, what became of this $75,000,000? Why, some gentleman may say that we have spent a portion of it in Cuba in maintaining our troops there, and we have spent some of it in Porto Rico in maintaining troops there. We have not had 10,000 troops altogether there, and we could easily have spared those from the 25,000 in this country, for we had no use for the 25,000 that we had, none whatever; and so this expense can only be attributed, so far as I know, with the exception of a few millions spent in China, to the war we have been waging with our allies in the Philippines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said at the outset, I am in favor of the minority bill. I am not in favor of what some gentlemen insist upon that side—of scuttling the ship and leaving those people to their fate. I might have been in favor of that before destroying that country and leaving it a howling wilderness. If we owed them any debt when this treaty was signed—if we owed them anything then, I say in God's name we owe them much more now. What is that? We owe it to them to go to work and assist them to establish a stable form of Government, which this minority bill proposes to do. We propose to hold out to them the promises of self-government, of liberty and justice, which they are entitled to demand at our hands. I want to incorporate in my speech—for the country has nearly forgotten it—the joint resolution recognizing the independence of the people of Cuba, etc. I think it ought to go in every few days.

Public resolution, No. 21.—Joint resolution for the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and to withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with 266 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Habana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

I want to say that I believe our obligation is as binding to the people of the Philippines, notwithstanding they are not mentioned in that resolution; we owe them the same duty that we owe the people of Cuba. As has been well said by the President in his instructions, we had no idea of going to the Philippine Islands or to conquer those islands. These people were there fighting for their liberty, just the same as the people of Cuba were. It is a mistake for gentlemen to try to present to the country the fact that these insurgents were not contending for their liberty until Aguinaldo arrived. All you have got to do is to read the reports of our consul who was in Manila and in the archipelago three months before the landing of Dewey, and you will find that these insurgents were fighting the Spaniards and pushing them from the interior in every direction, and when Aguinaldo arrived he found an organized force there who were contending for their liberty just the same as those recognized and aided in Cuba.

Now, I say our obligation to these people under this resolution was just as binding as to the people of Cuba. Yet we have not carried out our obligations to Cuba. We have said to the world that Cuba is free. Free Cuba. Why, there is not a man in this House who does not know that there is not a word of truth in that; not a word. Cuba is not free, and never will be free of the United States. Never. We have not carried out this resolution. We have not carried out our written pledges. But let that be as it may, I say that the same obligation that we owe to the Cuban people we owe to the people of the Philippine Islands, and if we can give to Cuba liberty, if we can establish a stable form of government, and then turn their government over to them, we can do the same thing for the Philippine people, and before God and man we owe it to them, and we ought to do it. [Loud applause.]

But our friends on the other side say we are down there by divine right. I call your attention to the official record. How did we get those islands? What was the plea? The plea of obligation due to our allies, the Philippine people, for enabling us to conquer the Spaniards. That is the last resort of our Commission, to seek to justify us in acquiring those islands before the civilized world, and yet we have made their country a howling wilderness, with orders to kill everything 10 years old and up. In other words, we owe the Philippine people, our allies, liberty and independence. I say to you gentlemen, in my judgment, when the people of the United States fully recognize the fact that I have endeavored to show to-day, they will see that instead of the great God being behind this movement and fostering and carrying on this war that has been waged upon these people, they will come to the conclusion that it is the devil, instead of God Almighty, that is running the machine.

I thank the House for its attention. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

APPENDIX.

PHILIPPINE DATA.

Secretary Root's figures in regard to the cost of the Philippine war, whether they were intended to mislead or not, are entirely misleading. These figures, given to the public within the last two or three days, after the lapse of two months since they were called for by Congress, show that the expenses of the Philippine war during the last four years have been only $170,000,000. This amount evidently represents only the sum actually expended in the Philippines and for transportation to and from those islands. It obviously does not include the expense of maintenance of the largely increased Army of the United States under the new Army reorganization bill. But this method of statement on the part of the Secretary is absolutely unfair and disingenuous, to designate it by no harsher term.

Here is the case in a nut shell: Before the Spanish war the Army consisted of, say, 25,000 men, and the Army appropriation bills were never more than $30,000,000, and generally about $25,000,000. The bills for 1897 and 1898, just before the war, were $23,000,000 apiece, in round numbers. The bill passed during the year of the Spanish war carried $80,000,000. Nobody complained or wondered at that. But the war was soon over, and the natural supposition was that the Army could be reduced at once to a peace footing and the Army appropriation bills would be returned at once to their normal dimensions. Instead of that, what happened? The Army was reorganized on a permanently enlarged basis of 100,000 men, and the next two years Army appropriation bills amounted to $114,000,000 and $116,000,000, respectively. Why was this done? It was entirely on account of the Philippines.

In other words, the Army would not have been enlarged beyond its former dimensions before the Spanish war if it had not been for our Philippine occupation. Instead of having an army of the present large dimensions we should now have an army of 25,000 men or thereabouts, as before the war. Why not? Why should we need a larger army? We have no further use for troops in Cuba, and we are at peace with all the rest of the world except the Philippines. Therefore the entire expense of the Army over and above the $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 required annually for the Army on a peace footing is chargeable to the account of the Philippines.

As already stated, this difference during the past four years amounts on the lowest estimate to more than $400,000,000.

Another way of getting at the facts is the following: During the past four years the appropriations for our enlarged Army have been about $80,000,000 or $85,000,000 more than the normal annually. The total extra expense for the four years has been thus all the way from $320,000,000 to $340,000,000. This has been simply for the maintenance of the Army—that is to say, of the additional army, over and above the normal—and that is what it would have cost to maintain this additional army force in this country. Now, add to this the $170,000,000 reported by the Secretary as the expenses incurred by maintaining our forces in the Philippines and we have a total of over $500,000,000. Or, if it is not fair to include all of this $170,000,000 as extra expenses due to foreign occupation, in addition to the $320,000,000 to $340,000,000, certainly a good part thereof must be thus reckoned, because it always costs more to support an army away from home, owing to transportation expenses and many other obvious sources of expense. So if we add only one-half of the Secretary's figures we get a total of over $400,000,000, as before.

Notice also as a collateral argument the obvious fact that a greatly enlarged Army means also a greatly enlarged and more expensive pension list, and in this case, moreover, a pension list on account of the war which is considered by a large part of our citizens unjustifiable and wrong.

COURSE IN SAMAR WAS UPHELD—THE PRESIDENT, AFTER HIS REVIEW OF THE CASE, MAY DISAPPROVE THE FINDINGS, BUT CAN NOT NOW IMPOSE ANY PUNISHMENT BEYOND CRITICISM—ADMISSIONS BY THE ACCUSED AT THE TRIAL.

Announcement was made at the War Department yesterday that Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith will be immediately ordered to proceed to San Francisco and will then be placed in command of the military department of the Texas. This action of the Department dispels any doubt that may have existed as to the findings of the court which tried General Smith for his conduct of the campaign in Samar. He has been acquitted, and, so far as the court is concerned, there will be no further proceedings against him. It now remains for the President to review the case, and he is expected to make public his views in the course of ten days. He may disapprove the findings of the court and strongly condemn General Smith's work in Samar; but there can now be no punishment save in the way of criticism.

The record, which the President has received, contains the exact language of the admissions made by Colonel Woodruff, counsel for General Smith, in regard to the orders which the latter officer issued to Major Waller, United States Marines. The charge was "conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline," and it was supported by this specification:

"In that Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith, United States Army, commanding general of the Sixth Separate Brigade, Division of the Philippines, did give instructions in regard to the conduct of hostilities in the island of Samar, P. I., to his subordinate officer, Maj. L. W. T. Waller, United States Marine Corps, the said Major Waller being under his command and commanding at the time a subterritorial district in the island of Samar, P. I., in language and words, to wit:

"'I want no prisoners' (meaning thereby that giving of quarter was not desired or required), and 'I wish you to kill and burn. The more you kill and burn the better you will please me,' and 'the interior of Samar must be made a howling wilderness,' and did give further instructions to said Major Waller that he, General Smith, wanted all persons killed who were capable of bearing arms, and did, in reply to a question by the said Major Waller, asking for an age limit, designate the age limit at 10 years.

"This at or near the island of Samar, P. I., between the 23d and 28th days of October, 1901."

SMITH'S PLEA AND ADMISSIONS.

The record then gives General Smith's plea to the charge and specifications, which was "not guilty." Colonel Woodruff's statement, which was partially cabled at the time it was made, is then given in full, as follows:

"The accused desires to simplify this case as much as possible, and admits that he was commanding-general of the Sixth Separate Brigade, Division of the Philippines; that Major Waller was one of his subordinate officers, commanding a subterritorial district, and that he did give him personal instructions relating to hostiles under arms in the field, and he did instruct him not to burden himself with prisoners, of which General Smith already had so many that the efficiency of his command was impaired, and tell him that he wanted him to kill and burn in the interior and hostile country; and did further instruct him that the interior of Samar must be made a howling wilderness; and did further instruct him that he wanted all persons kille l who were capable of bearing arms and were actively engaged in hostilities; and that he did designate the age limit at 10 years, as boys of that age were actively engaged in hostilities against the United States authorities, and were equally dangerous as an enemy as those of more mature age."

The record then shows that the judge-advocate asked this question:

"Does the accused admit that as his statements?"

"I do," was the response of General Smith.

Major Waller testified, according to the record, that he had been told to kill and burn, but he understood that these instructions did not relate to all the inhabitants of Samar, but only to those engaged in hostilities, and he denied that General Smith had authorized any killing or burning not demanded by circumstances or authorized by the laws of war. The evidence submitted by General Smith in defense was divided under three heads:

First. The character and methods of the natives of Samar.

Second. Evidence showing the military conditions existing in Samar when General Smith took command.

Third. The plans formed by him to meet those conditions, and the result.

Lieutenant Guajot, of the Tenth Cavalry, who was in command at Calbiga, testified:

"In a conversation with insurgent officers, General Guevara told me himself that there was not a boy 8 years old on the Ganadara River who could not handle a bolo or make a cartridge. Colonel Sebastian said the same, but fixed the age at 10."

Other officers testified as to the youthfulness of the Samar insurgents, and one of them, Captain Ayer, said that he regarded the inhabitants of the island as mostly savages, some barbarians, and a small percentage semi-civilized.

In answer to an inquiry on the subject, General Chaffee has informed the Secretary of War that the record of the proceedings of the court-martial in the case of Maj. L. W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps, were forwarded to Washington on the transport Kilpatrick, which left Manila May 19. The Kilpatrick is expected to reach San Francisco in a few days.

Mr. MADDOX. I yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed forty-eight minutes.

Mr. BROMWELL. It has been an interesting question to Republicans, and no doubt to every Democrat, as to what shall be the issues of the coming campaign. It has seemed to us, and I believe it has seemed to the Democrats, that every issue that has been raised between the parties in the past has been relegated to obscurity by the action of the people of the United States, and that the Democrats to-day are without any live, substantial controversy upon which to go before the people of this country in the next campaign.

As a matter of some curiosity, I have been reading and listening to find out, if possible, what questions we shall have to meet on the platform this next fall. I have gone to Democratic sources to ascertain the answer to this question. I have read the utterances of that great ex-leader of Democracy, William J. Bryan, and more recently the words of that other great ex-leader of Democracy, Grover Cleveland, and his associate, David B. Hill. Two or three days ago there appeared in what I consider the leading Democratic paper of the United States, the Cincinnati Enquirer, an editorial, and for the few minutes that I shall occupy the attention of the House I wish to take that editorial as the text for the remarks which I shall make.

The Cincinnati Enquirer is owned and published by Mr. John R. McLean. Mr. McLean is at this time engaged in a controversy with another distinguished Democrat from the State of Ohio, Tom Johnson, of Cleveland, for political supremacy, and the controversy between these distinguished gentlemen has been the occasion for the inspired editorial to which I refer. I shall read from this editorial here and there, taking the liberty of making some comments upon it as I go along, and, with the permission of the House, will include the whole of it in my remarks. It is as follows:

The Democratic party of Ohio, as a party, has always been true to the organization. Its fidelity began with the admission of the States of the Union a century ago and has lasted without surcease to the present interesting moment.

In other words, as I construe that statement, it means that whatever may have been the opinions of the Democrats of the State of Ohio as a party, or of the individual Democrats of that State, they have unhesitatingly sacrificed their own views and principles to the declarations of the party platform as set forth in the national convention, and have voted for their national platform, right or wrong.

I read on:

It has preserved a sturdy front in defeats as well as in victories; it has survived "isms," the schisms, and rebellion.

I think the editorial is defective in omitting the pronoun "its," as I think that it should have read "its isms, schisms, and rebellion."

It has been tolerant of those departures from the true faith which insinuate themselves in wrong and dreary minority periods, but it has maintained strong bridges on which to cross back to solid ground.

In other words, however much it may recognize the fallacy of national platforms, however false its position may be upon the great questions which have been submitted to the country, it has followed them blindly and willingly because they are the utterances of the national party leaders. But the saving clause is "it has maintained strong bridges upon which to cross back to solid ground."

And then the editorial goes on further along to tell us what some of these strong bridges are upon which they hope again to get out of the quagmire of defeat upon the sure ground of victory:

It has had strong temptations to heretical alliances, and it has been trifled with by pestiferous and pettifogging politicians, but it has never lost its recuperative quality.

I presume these pestiferous, pettifogging politicians to which he refers are Bryan and the followers of Bryan in the last two campaigns.

It has been an enduring force in affairs, and its history is the best incentive to work for success in the future.

Then he goes on to recapitulate some of the history of this Democratic party:

Not to go back further than 1852, the Democrats carried the State for Franklin Pierce. They were steadfast to James Buchanan in 1856.

A thing, I suppose, that most Democrats do not look back to now with any great amount of pride.

They voted for Douglas in 1860, when the clouds of war threatened to obscure all party lines. They rallied to Vallandigham in obedience to the mandate of their representatives in State convention assembled, in the midst of the greatest civil strife of all time. They gave earnest support to George B. McClellan in 1864 against Abraham Lincoln. They voted for Horatio Seymour in 1868 in opposition to the greatest captain that had been developed by a bloody war lasting four years. In 1872, again opposing Grant, they crowded their prejudices aside and were loyal to the ticket made by a combination of Democrats and Liberal Republicans, voting for Horace Greeley, who had been a lifelong Republican, but was opposed to the attitude of his party at that time.

A party of expediency! Unwilling, because recognizing that they would be defeated, to support the regular candidate of their own party, with the rallying cry of "anything to beat Grant" the Democracy of Ohio undertook to elect a lifelong Republican, Horace Greeley.

Four years later the evolution of politics brought them to the support once more of a great and real Democrat, Samuel J. Tilden.

A great and real Democrat! This is an insinuation, this is an innuendo as against the other candidates of the Democratic party which it seems to me unfair and unjust to make. To say that Tilden was a real Democrat is an intimation that the others were weaklings and frauds.

And they endured the most gigantic robbery known to politics with patience, patriotism, and a sublime faith in the ultimate triumph of their principles.

We all recall the campaign, that exciting campaign, between Tilden and Hayes. We know that the result of that campaign was left to a board of arbitration, and we know that that board of arbitration seated President Hayes. It looks to us as if the attempt to belittle, the attempt to disparage the result of that arbitration is hardly fair, to say the least, on the part of the Democratic party, who consented to the arbitration and should have swallowed their disappointment when the award was against them.

The incentive to revolution was almost as great as that which brought on the war in the sixties, but self-sacrifice kept the peace and the Democrats of Ohio lived as a tremendous entity to stand by Hancock in 1880, though he was a candidate of expediency rather than fairly representative of original Democratic principles.

Again a slur upon the national candidate as a candidate of expediency and not representative of Democratic principles.

They were for Grover Cleveland in 1884, and waiving many bitter disappointments and in obedience to the action of their authorized delegates in national conventions, stood shoulder to shoulder for Cleveland twice more, coming within a flimsy fraction of carrying the State for him in 1892. The campaigns of 1896 and 1900 were overwhelming examples of the faithfulness of the Ohio Democrats to the organization of the party. They were for the Chicago platform and the men who stood upon it, against the campaign money power of the State and country, against the deluge of charges that they were consorting with anarchy, destroying the courts, and entering on a civil and social revolution which no cause could stand against. They were loyal and true to their declaration of principles and to the leaders in opposition to every corporate and capitalistic interest, and in a cause that was likely to cultivate the antagonism of nearly every man who had a dollar to contribute to campaign expenses.

The Democrats of Ohio have gone through all these things for the sake of the future. Many of their campaigns have been forlorn hopes. They have frequently fought under impossibility of winning in alliance with men who were not true Democrats to preserve the organization and to win as many men to the true faith as possible.

What an admission for a great Democratic paper to make! That without any reference to party principles, merely to catch votes, they were ready to ally and to connect themselves with any party that was willing to join with them in opposition to the great Republican party.

Such a party can not go to pieces. It has always had an ultimate end in view.

An ultimate end! Yes; the end of securing control of the Government—not the end of the good of the country, but the end of coming into power and holding office.

The Democrats of Ohio especially have long yearned for the time when their forces might be combined under a platform and policy for which no apology need be made, and which, without explanation or elaboration, would command the devotion of all real patriots.

Their time is near at hand, if they pursue a policy of common sense. That policy will not be to make the party a mere apparatus for juggling by some sensational performer in politics. It will not be to make it any longer a hopper for all the fads and heresies and cheap inventions in "statesmanship" which the Republican leaders have rejected.

It will not be to make it the medium of introducing paternalism in our local and national affairs. It will not be to place it in the experimental hands of those who are always obstructive and never progressive—those who believe that there is only advancement in tearing to pieces the mightiest structures that have arisen from the best thought of the country for a hundred years.

It looks to me, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the Democratic side, as if this were a direct admonition to the gentlemen of the minority of this House.

The country is prosperous. The ipse dixit of no public man, no matter how eloquently the rhetoric may pour forth from his prolific mouth, can prevail agianst a condition that makes so many people happy.

What a vivid picture of that great leader of yours, William Jennings Bryan—"the rhetoric that may pour forth from his prolific mouth"—perhaps as picturesque a description of him as could be given.

A volume of resolutions by political conventions, with storms of applause and music by a syndicate of brass bands, can not restore the "issues" which passed into the night when South Africa yielded her golden treasures, and the sturdy adventurers went to the Klondike, and lifting the frosty covering looked upon a yellow wealth that made pigmies of our greatest statesmen in finance. Nature came to the rescue, and gave the country that which was prayed for by those who were reasonable and consistent in their advocacy of the Chicago and Kansas City platforms—plenty of money to do the business of the country with.

I may add——

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order, that under the rule governing this debate the remarks of the gentleman now on the floor are irrelevant.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAPRON). The Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Why is the rule governing debate in the daytime different from the rule governing debate at night?

Mr. BROMWELL. Because gentlemen are liable to get more light on the subject in the daytime than at night.

The CHAIRMAN. For the information of the gentleman from Missouri, the Clerk will read the paragraph of the special rule pertaining to this question.

Mr. BROMWELL. I do not wonder that the gentleman from Missouri objects to this editorial being read and put into the RECORD.

Mr. NORTON. Oh, no; we like it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That after Thursday, June 19, and during the continuance of this order, the House shall meet each day at 11 o'clock, and at 5 o'clock on each day a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock for evening sessions, which evening sessions shall continue not later than 10.30 p. m., and be devoted to debate only on said bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I submit, Mr. Chairman, it never was intended to make a different rule for general debate at night from the general rule prevailing during the day. Such a distinction was never enforced in the House of Representatives before. I never saw a time when a rule like that prevailed—to say that you must debate a measure in one way at night and in another way during the daytime. I am not objecting to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], because I think they are an improvement on the remarks we generally get from my friend, inasmuch as he is now quoting somebody else.

Mr. BROMWELL. It is very kind of my friend from Tennessee to say that.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I suggest that neither as to the night nor the day does the rule bear the construction suggested by the gentleman from Missouri. The meaning of the rule is that the night session shall be devoted to "debate only."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is all. But the rule enforced last night was that the general debate must be confined to the pending question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say, for the information of the committee, that it was the statement of the gentleman from Virginia that the rule should be applied, and it was so held by the Chair.

Mr. COCHRAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Was the ruling which was enforced last night made by the present presiding officer?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not.

Mr. COCHRAN. Was it made when a Democrat was addressing the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It was made when a Republican was addressing the House, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. COCHRAN. If it was made when a Democrat was addressing the House, that would account for the rule being changed to suit a different situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that he wishes to be governed by the rule as it has been understood and enforced.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. My understanding of the rule was that debate at night sessions must be confined to the bill under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will so hold; the rule has been so interpreted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is correct in his construction of the rule. It is that the night sessions shall be "for debate only;" that is, that there shall be no legislation, no motions; that there shall be only debate. No other meaning was ever intended as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes that, the debate having been extended to take in the war in South Africa and many other subjects, the gentleman now on the floor should be permitted to proceed.

Mr. BROMWELL. I read on from this very interesting editorial, which seems to have stirred up the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Missouri:

The Democratic party can not win on a defunct money issue, or on a policy that takes it in any degree out of sympathy with and admiration for the brave soldiers and sailors who are fighting the battles of their country—yea, the country's battles, whether the policy at Washington is right or wrong, or in support of crank propositions to abolish private enterprise and teach the people that they must depend on government for everything, or to follow sensational leaderships that, if they ever had any principle, have been denuded of it by selfishness.

The Democratic party must be up to date. It must not submit to being held back or chained to the past. There is no better ground than Ohio for a revival of true principles. The signs of the times are unmistakable. The Democrats of Indiana have taken a splendid forward step. The Democrats of other States have followed, and manifestly more are to come. The Ohio Democrats, than whom there have been no more faithful and patriotic, should not be laggards.

This is the testimony, this is the admonition, this is the advice of the leading Democratic paper of the country.

Now, a night or two ago there was a meeting of distinguished Democrats in the city of New York, and the chairman of that meeting in introducing the first speaker said:

We have with us here to-night the greatest of living Democrats.

Four years ago, or two years ago, I should have thought, of course—and we all would have thought—that he meant William Jennings Bryan; but we hear no more of him as the matchless leader, the great chieftain, the greatest living Democrat, and we find by looking over the report a little further that instead of William Jennings Bryan being introduced to that distinguished meeting of Democrats that it was the honorable ex-President of the United States, Grover Cleveland.

Omitting a few of his preliminary remarks, I want to quote a few words from the report of what he said at that meeting:

The Democratic party is far from political insolvency, but no one here should be offended by the suggestion that its capital and prospects have suffered serious injury since Mr. Tilden was elected President.

Not only serious injury, but many times it has gone into the bankruptcy court of public opinion, has been declared a bankrupt, has been given its discharge in the hope that it would go forth and do business in a more honorable and honest manner.

Then and afterwards Northern Democratic States were not curiosities; Northern Democratic Senators, now practically extinct, were quite numerous, and Northern Democratic governors, now almost never seen, were frequently encountered.

I am reminded by this of a little anecdote that was told by a sort of Sol Smith Russell friend of mine who took part in the campaign at the last election for President. Speaking of the fact that the Democrats would vote their ticket, right or wrong, that the Democratic majority in the South would be, as it always had been for years, given to the Democratic candidate for President in spite of the fact that the people of the South, recognizing the prosperity that had come to all the country, South as well as North, were in sympathy with the election of McKinley and the continuance of the Republican party and the Republican policies, he put it in this way. I shall not attempt to imitate his peculiar drawl and his droll way of stating it, but this was what he said: "All the electors north of Mason and Dixon's line will be for William McKinley. All the electors south of Mason and Dixon's line will be for William Jennings Bryan, and all the people south of Mason and Dixon's line will be glad that there are more electoral votes north of Mason and Dixon's line than there are south of it."

Cleveland went on to say:

If this state of impairment exists, an instant duty presses upon the managers of the Democratic establishment, and one which they can not evade with honor. Those of us less prominent in the party—the rank and file—are longing to be led through old Democratic ways to old Democratic victories. We were never more ready to do enthusiastic battle than now, if we can only be marshaled outside the shadow of predestined defeat. Is it too much to ask our leaders to avoid paths that are known to lead to disaster? Is it too much to ask that proven errors be abandoned, and that we be delivered from a death, and relieved from the burden of issues which have been killed by the decrees of the American people? Ought we not be fed upon something better than the husks of defeat? If these questions are met in an honest, manly fashion, I believe it will be productive of the best kind of Democratic harmony.

I know that Grover Cleveland stands discredited with a large part of his party. I know that he is held responsible for many of the mistakes that were made during the time that he was President of the United States by the party which had elected him; but I know also that from Grover Cleveland and Watterson and Hill and McLean are coming words of advice and admonition to the Democratic party which they must heed if they expect to succeed in the coming or in any other campaign of the future. Past issues, dead issues—issues which the American people can never sympathize with—will never be the means of riding again into power in this Government.

The Cincinnati Times-Star, commenting upon the editorial of the Enquirer, says:

> The Democracy of the past eight years and its leaders have never had a more severe arraignment than was contained in that paragraph.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems from the debate in this House and from the utterances of those who would be leaders of the Democratic party that practically the issues which they seek to inject into the coming campaign will be two. The issue of imperialism, of holding on to the Philippines, or promising them an independent government at some future time; that is one. The other is the cry against the trusts. Outside of these two issues I have learned of nothing, I know of nothing, I can conceive of nothing that the Democratic party will put forth as a claim for the consideration of the country.

Now, let us look for just a moment at these issues. It is perhaps useless for me to repeat what has been said so many times and so much better than I can say it, that the Democratic party equally with the Republican party is responsible for the condition of affairs in the Philippines. It was the Democratic party which was largely instrumental in forcing the war with Spain. It was the Democratic party which insisted with a few of us Republicans—and I will admit I was one of them—that the President of the United States, after the destruction of the Maine, should immediately declare war.

It was the Democratic party that was specially insistent upon this in spite of the fact that the President wished to hold back until the country should be ready for the great struggle. It was the Democratic party that voted with us the appropriation for carrying on that war. It was the Democratic party, with the Republican party, which voted for the treaty of peace, and it was the great Democratic leader, William Jennings Bryan, who made it possible for the treaty of peace to be ratified in the Senate of the United States.

For the provisions of that treaty of peace as well as the declaration of war against Spain the Democrats are responsible as much as are the Republicans. And whatever the results have been, whether we are in the right or in the wrong, so far as the present situation is concerned, whether we have been wise or foolish in our policy, the Democrats joined with us in these two great initial steps. We have the Philippines, and it seems that the great question as between the two parties will be as to what we shall do with them. The Republican party believes that they are committed, that they are pledged, that the whole country is committed and pledged to the establishment of a peaceful and a permanent government of the islands, and proposes to leave themselves free to meet any condition that may arise in the meanwhile.

The Democratic party, without considering the needs, the happiness, the future of the people of these islands, insist that we shall put them at once on a status of absolute independence. They forget that it took hundreds of years—aye, up into the thousands—for the great Anglo-Saxon race in England to emerge from a state of serfdom to the condition such as exists to-day. Nations are not made in a day. A people can not be lifted from slavery to the heights of freedom in an hour. It took all these generations, through all the successive centuries, through all the growth and development of parliamentary law in Great Britain, to bring the British people to the condition of freedom and liberty in which they now stand.

Take the people of our own country a hundred years ago and compare them with our condition to-day, and what wonderful progress has been made in that time. For two hundred and fifty years we have been struggling in this country against Indian tribes. In four years we have gotten in the Philippine Islands to the point of restoring order among a more savage and a more treacherous people than the Indians. We have made wonderful progress. To-day we can look over the Philippines and feel that the dove of peace has almost settled with her white wings upon those islands.

Gentlemen speak of the cruelty of this war, and the cruelties that have been practiced and perpetrated by the officers and men of our army in the Philippines. Mr. Chairman, there never was a war but what was cruel; there never was a war but what there were instances of cruelty which shocked mankind. The conditions of peace and the conditions of war are two entirely different states. Napoleon shot down thousands of insurgents at Cairo and burned others to death in their buildings; Sherman in his march to the sea destroyed the country through which he passed; Washington hung André and the British executed Hale; the massacre at Fort Pillow; the barbarities practiced in Southern prisons at Salisbury and Libby prison; all these are incidents of war. If it be true, as claimed, that a "howling wilderness" has been made in the Philippines, for one I am ready to believe that it was a necessity that this destruction of life and property should occur in order that the great and final end of bringing permanent peace to the islands might be accomplished.

It is not my intention to go into details or to make extended remarks upon this Philippine question. The country is familiar with all the facts. The people have formed their judgment, and it will be well for the Democratic party to heed the warning of the great paper from which I have heretofore quoted, and those words of admonition that "It can not win on a policy that makes it any degree out of sympathy with and admiration for the brave soldiers and sailors who are fighting the battles of their country—yea, the country's battles, whether the policy at Washington is right or wrong."

On the other possible issue, that of the trusts, even less is necessary to be said. Under the limitations of our Constitution it is difficult to enact stringent legislation, or even moderate and necessary laws, for the control of monopolies and trusts. To fully reach and regulate them it is the judgment of all persons at all familiar with the subject that the Constitution would have to be amended, and yet when the resolution for such a constitutional amendment to enable Congress to define, regulate, and dissolve obnoxious trusts and similar combinations was under consideration in the House of Representatives in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and when that resolution required a two-thirds vote to pass it, we can not forget that every Republican in this House, with two exceptions, voted for it and every Democrat except two voted against and defeated it, because the Republicans did not have the required two-thirds without the help of some Democratic votes. Thus, while clamoring against the trusts for party purposes and to catch votes, the Democratic members of this House refused to furnish the few votes that were necessary to start the legislation which would have ultimately placed the control of the whole question in the hands of Congress and the President.

The pretense that the Republican party or that the Republican policy of protection is responsible for the trusts, as commonly understood, is false and fraudulent. Only in so far as protection to American industries has built up and enormously increased all manufacturing interests in the United States, whether controlled by trusts or individuals, is our party to be credited with the fact that trusts are thriving. The tariff has nothing to do with trusts, except as it makes business. Trusts are a development of new conditions which have arisen in the business world, and would exist and did exist to a certain extent under free trade and with the Democratic party in power. They would exist to-day, although they might not do as much business, were every branch of the Government in the hands of the Democrats. Neither must we forget that the capital which is invested in these great combinations is not the capital of Republicans alone.

Were it possible to institute an inquiry as to the holders of interests in these great corporations, I venture to say that fully as many Democrats would be found participating in their profits as there are Republicans. The insincerity, therefore, of this whole cry of the Democratic party against the trusts stands on a par with the insincerity of the great portion of that party in their cry against the tariff and sound money; and as the people two years ago saw through the fallacy of their claims and relegated them to defeat, so in the coming campaign this fall and the greater one which will take place two years from now they will again express their disapproval and reinvest the party which they feel they can trust with the continued conduct of national affairs. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE].

[Mr. DINSMORE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, it can never be forgotten that the problem of imperialism was forced upon us by an act of Republican diplomacy, and that any evils that may have befallen or may befall our country, any scandals that may have occurred or may occur because of it, are and will be the direct outcome of an impossible system inaugurated by a Republican Administration.

No matter who may be responsible for existing conditions in the Philippines, there can be no difference of opinion as to our duty in upholding the Army while it is under fire. [Applause.] It is to be deplored that the Army should have become in any sense a political issue. The Army is not, never has been, and, God willing, never will be, the asset of any one party. It belongs to the whole country, and its history is the common glory of the entire nation.

It is true that bad appointments have been made—officers have been commissioned for political reasons and promoted for partisan purposes. Some discredit has come to the Army from the ill-advised and intemperate utterances of certain unaccepted heroes. There may have been, and I fear there have been, acts of cruelty, of unjustifiable cruelty, committed by American soldiers in the Philippines, but let us not forget the provocation under which our men have suffered; let us not prejudge their case. [Applause.] It is so easy to prefer charges against men who are 10,000 miles away; so difficult for them to make their defense. It is so easy to accuse our soldiers of dishonoring the uniform they wear when they are not at home to prove their innocence. If any of our men have done wrong, let them be rigorously punished, but until their guilt is proved let us give them the benefit of the doubt and not hold the entire Army responsible for the acts of a few black sheep. [Renewed applause.]

If it is true that mistakes have been made in the Philippines, if it is true that regrettable incidents have occurred, common fairness and common justice require that we hold responsible those in authority who are to blame, and not sacrifice to unreasoning prejudice the humble instruments of a mistaken policy, who are only obeying the orders they have received and doing their duty.

I feel that I should be unworthy, as the son of a Regular and as a Democrat, did I not say a word in praise of the modest and unassuming man who, at 40 cents a day, has done more to make this country glorious than all the oratory of a century—the Regular of the United States.

There is no army on earth so near the people as is ours. It is recruited from all parts of the country and from every walk in life. Its men are taken from the plow and from the railroad, from the shop and from the factory. It represents the very bone and sinew of the people of the United States. It is swayed by the same passions; it is subject to the same failings and the same temptations; it has the same virtues and the same vices as have all of us. Its merits are our merits; its sins are our own.

Sweltering and fighting in tropical jungles by day, shivering and still fighting in tropical rains by night, ill fed and insufficiently clothed, dying from wounds and pestilence, showing consideration and humanity to savage foes, who are ignorant of the meaning of either word; ambushed, captured, and tortured to death; performing acts of dashing gallantry the mere recital of which sends the blood tingling through the veins of every true man, it is all part of the day's work for the Regular, and he does it without thanks and without hope of reward, because he has the traditions of the United States Army to sustain. [Renewed applause.] He accomplishes so much, so well, and receives in return so little, so grudgingly given.

There is not a patriotic American, be he Democrat or be he Republican, who does not breathe a prayer and thank God for the Regulars who are fighting for the flag. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THAYER].

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, several months ago we passed a bill which we were told was to provide temporarily revenues for the Philippine Islands. That was the first move toward civil legislation for that people, and was, in my opinion, in contravention of the organic laws of our nation, against the spirit and essence of our institutions and the generous, just, and statesmanlike policies which have hitherto been promulgated in our Republic for a century and a quarter. That mistake was but the forerunner of those contained in this bill. One error or one mistake in the history of an individual or a nation does not long stand alone; others follow. This is a second step in the onward march toward the consummation of imperialism. It is but a natural and logical sequence and an exemplification of the historic fact that a nation which commits a wrong in its transactions with another people will endeavor to perpetuate, confirm, and firmly establish it by a series of wrongful acts. It gives evidence of a fixed purpose to continue the policy of colonial expansion maintained against an unwilling people through the dire necessity of terrible warfare, with all its attendant atrocities.

But all this, serious and lamentable as it is, might be borne and endured; but, above and beyond this, and transcending all in its deplorable effects, is the wanton and willing surrender of the precious heritage bequeathed to us by the fathers of the Republic—a heritage heretofore sacredly guarded as the altar of our national faith, the corner-stone upon which the superstructure of the Republic is erected—that of being a free people, standing conspicuously first and quite alone among the nations of the earth for independence and self-government, not only for ourselves, but for every people seeking the same in every clime round the world, and unless there is an awakening of the conscience of the nation now there will be fastened irrevocably upon us the policy of colonial expansion and imperial armies.

Mr. Chairman, think, if you will; comprehend, if you can, the situation we this day occupy and the spectacle we present to the less favored nations of the Old World! We, the sons, but a few generations removed, of the Revolutionary fathers, waging a cruel war with fire and sword and all the attendant atrocities which inevitably must follow in the path of an attempt by a great, powerful nation to conquer, subjugate, and exterminate, if need be, an inferior people unaccustomed to civilized warfare and struggling only for a liberty like that which we enjoy and which we would sacrifice our lives, our treasure, and our all to defend and maintain.

That, briefly stated, is the situation we this day occupy. It is not my purpose to recite the events or restate the history and the conditions which prevailed when we entered upon this war of subjugation. This is unnecessary and futile. We are all agreed upon the history and the conditions. Every school child in the country can repeat them. There is no disagreement here. What we do disagree about is the propriety, necessity, or justice of entering upon and maintaining this war for the purposes for which it has been prosecuted. Upon this question good men, true men, patriotic men may differ and have honestly differed. I have always attempted to respect the opinions of those who have held and now hold views upon this question differing from my own, and I only ask in return to be treated with the same consideration.

I object to these latter-day statesmen who constitute the awkward squad of raw recruits practicing new tactics on the Constitution, in Congress or out of it, continually and insultingly insinuating and asserting that those who differ from them on this question are less patriotic or more indifferent to the welfare of this country and her institutions than they are. These people, drawing themselves to their full height, with the air of one who is all sufficient, ask "Who will haul down the flag?" as if the challenge contained in those words answered every argument, effectually silenced every opponent, and branded those who oppose this policy as disloyalists and traitors.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to accept the challenge and to tell who "will haul down the flag" in the Philippines. Some descendant of the old colonial soldier who raised it on the heights of Concord and Bunker Hill and planted it on the ramparts at Yorktown; a son of the old soldier who unfurled it on Little Round Top at Gettysburg and waved it over a reunited people at Appomattox; a messmate, it may be, of him who, after we had called all Europe to the deliverance of their ambassadors and ministers in China and to a restoration of peace and order there, and had permitted none of those powers to appropriate, capture, or control any portion of this great Empire of the East, pointing out to those powers the line and course of their departure home, hauled down the flag, unstained and unsullied, in China, amidst the cheers and expressions of thanksgiving of a grateful people; a comrade of him who, after the American Republic had given birth and life to the young Cuban Republic and brought her into the family of nations only last month, amid the shouts and benefactions of a free people, hauled it down in Cuba.

This is he in whose veins flows the blood of those who loved liberty and hated despotism, animated as were his great progenitors with a love of liberty, justice, and righteousness, who will haul down the flag in the Philippines amid the plaudits, prayers, and benedictions of 10,000,000 grateful people inhabiting the archipelago and with the sanction and approval of the liberty-loving people of the whole civilized world. When will he "haul down the flag?" After the Filipinos have laid down their arms and acknowledged our supremacy and our sovereignty, upon our announcement to them—which announcement should be made this day—that they may be free and independent and set up a republic of their own choosing, in their own way.

Those who disagree with us on the Republican policy toward the Philippines have no patent on patriotism. We have the past history of our country in our support. We have many of the great thinkers and the statesmen in the Republican ranks on our side, some of them at great personal and political sacrifice. We have the great organic law of the Republic in our defense. Why should we be timorous or silent, even if a present general of the Army, fuller of wine than wisdom, and released from constraint, does declare that he would prefer to see members of Congress who criticise this un-American Philippine policy and some features of the conduct of the war hanged than to look upon the dead body of a single soldier.

Mr. Chairman, has it come to this that a general of the Army, a servant of the people, can with impunity assert upon public or quasi public occasion, in the forepart or the afterpart of a banquet, that he would like to see members of Congress hung, for no other offense except that they have attempted to perform the duty imposed upon each as they saw the light, and to convince by argument in a dignified and legitimate way those who oppose them?

Mr. Chairman, I would not willingly avail myself of the liberty of speech which this House afford to intentionally do anyone an injury, and least of all officers in the Army. I am pleased to believe that such inflammatory utterances as I have referred to have been indulged in by a very limited few and under circumstances and conditions when we ought not to hold the speaker to too strict an accountability. We should always bear in mind the frailty of human nature and how easily some people fall when tempted. I am willing to be generous, even at the expense of justice, in this matter, and I assume that General Funston intended his remarks to be taken in a Pickwickian sense, so to speak, but I think the fact still remains that his purpose was, if he was capable at the time of forming a purpose, to impress upon his hearers the idea that generally those who oppose the Philippine policy are less patriotic, love less their institutions, and are less interested and anxious for the welfare of the Republic than those who do not oppose it.

This I wish to resent with all the power of my being and to deny in the most positive and emphatic terms. Patriotism is not confined to any party or any zone, and much less to those alone who support this un-American policy. Patriotism knows no latitude or longitude. It is as broad as the American Republic and as deep and pure as the promptings of the soul. If there were needed in recent years evidence of the truth of this statement, it was furnished by the zeal and alacrity with which citizens of every State and Territory responded to the call when war was declared to liberate the Cuban people from the thraldom of a tyrannical ruler; and what is more to the point, when a call was made to prosecute this terrible war in the Philippines every State vied with every other State and Territory in contributing its full share to swell the ranks of the Army to the required number.

The attempt to place us in the light of criticising the Army is a claptrap argument, if, indeed, it rises to the dignity of argument, used purely for political purposes. It is known that the Democratic party is opposed to the present Republican Philippine policy; and if it can be made to appear that the opponents to the policy are criticising the Army, feeling will be engendered in the Army against those making the charges, and their attention directed from the atrocities complained of and from the waning popularity of the policy itself. It is true that the Democratic party is opposed to our Philippine policy; but it is not true that it is unfriendly to the Army or would, in the least degree, detract from the glory and honor of its great achievements.

The true, loyal, and patriotic citizen is ever ready to support the flag of his country, and wherever for the time being it floats, right or wrong, it must be defended and upheld. And may it ever be so. But that man is false to himself, false to his country, and false to his God, who in the councils of the nation and upon all proper occasions fails to cry aloud and spare not against any governmental policy or purpose, whether at the time popular or unpopular, which he honestly believes to be detrimental to the best interests of the Republic, contrary to the fundamental principles of the Government, and subversive of the rights of any people.

That General Funston was a brave soldier I do not doubt. I would not wish to deprive him of the credit due him for his intrepid bravery and dauntless bearing, which he displayed upon many occasions while at the head of his command in the war with the Filipinos. What, then, is the lesson to be learned by the strange conduct and stranger sayings of this brave general of the Army, when he traduces and insults those in whose keeping rests, in great measure, the civic power of this Republic? It has always been the proud boast of the American citizen that the greatness of the American Republic rested not in her great Army and Navy, but that the military was subservient to the civil authority, and that the strength and fortress of our power was in our civil institutions, which in turn rested upon the will of the individual citizen.

Who dares to contradict or deny that in the day when the military power assumes as of right greater dignity and control and takes upon itself the censorship of civil authority and civil life, that there is danger, great danger, to the Republic? Mr. Chairman, when we shall have emerged from this war; when armed resistance shall have ceased and peace is restored throughout the country and its possessions, we shall realize as never before how insidiously and imperceptibly the military has encroached upon the civil authority and prerogative, and in the changed conditions and tendencies we shall be imitating as never before the monarchies and kingdoms of the Old World in the strength and influence of their armies and navies.

Those who are committed to the present Philippine policy are swift to assert that we who oppose this policy are attempting to bring the Army into contempt; that we are "railing at the Army"—to use one of their choice expressions. This is an unwarranted assertion, and wanting in the great essential of truth. The Army is now and always has been composed of the young men of both political parties. At the present time I am informed that there are more Democrats than Republicans in the Philippine Army, but no one is asked to what party he belongs or from what section of the country he comes. The only inquiry made is whether he is willing to defend the flag where for the time being it floats. Those who criticise the present policy are as anxious to defend and uphold the honor and glory of the American Army and to defend our brave soldier boys as are those who support and favor the policy.

It is true that attention has been called to a few isolated cases where the conduct and orders of generals and officers in high positions were unworthy of the noble character our Army has always sustained, and the alacrity and avidity with which these orders, in a few instances, were enforced and promulgated by men in the lower stations of the Army under these commanders, tended to cast discredit upon the character of the Army. Every good citizen should be willing and anxious to protect and defend the good name and high character which the American armies have always sustained, and he best serves this purpose who does not conceal but brings to light and makes known the reprehensible conduct of the individual few who alone should assume the responsibility, to the end that the general character of the Army may be vindicated. Far from being a condemnation, this is a vindication of the Army.

Let us be fair and just in this matter, and dispassionately consider what was the purpose of those who have called attention to these few cruel orders and atrocities, and what the effect has been. "To rail at the American Army," as our opponents would have one believe? Not at all. But rather that the blame might fall upon the very limited few of the officers and men who were responsible for the barbaric orders and inhuman treatment visited upon the Filipinos in the execution of those orders, and that the character and standing of the Army as an army might not suffer for the acts of the few. And, secondly, that the people might fully realize the truth of the somewhat inelegant but expressive characterization of war by one of the greatest generals this country ever produced, namely, that "War is hell;" and especially so when it is waged by a great and powerful nation, fruitful in resources and trained in the ways of the higher civilization, against a weak, ignorant, and but partially civilized people just emerging from subjugation and thraldom. Wars and conflicts between superior races and inferior races are always conducted with barbarity, crueltry, and atrocity. The science of civilized warfare in such cases descends to bushwhacking, treachery, and guerrilla warfare, accompanied by all the atrocities and butchery which the barbaric brain can conceive.

This is the history of all wars in every country where the conditions were similar to those in our conflicts with the Filipinos. There is no question but what our soldiers at times were exasperated to madness by the treachery and atrocities of the Filipinos as they decoyed our troops into impassable jungles and over inaccessible mountains, butchering, maiming, and murdering as opportunity offered or revenge dictated. The whole atmosphere of the situation was charged with lawlessness, rapine, and murder. It became contagious, and in a few instances our generals and men were infected with the contagion and descended to the low level of their surroundings. Thank God, the epidemic was confined to a few localities and to a few persons. As I have said before, all these conditions and results should have been anticipated at the beginning, and the responsibility rests upon those who urged on the war against those weak and defenseless people, struggling, as they have been struggling for these hundreds of years, for independence.

But what of the morrow? When will there be an end to this bloodshedding and carnage? Sixty thousand soldiers have been there most of the time for the last three years; over 30,000 are still there. We are told that the organized army of the Philippines has been dispersed or has surrendered to us, and that the fighting is now carried on by lawless roving bands from the impassable jungles and inaccessible mountain wilds. But if it requires 30,000 troops now to preserve peace and order and protect the lives of the people and the commercial interests in the main islands, when will it require less than that force under conditions which are likely to exist? When will the hope for independence and spirit of liberty become extinguished in the breast of that unfortunate people? Let us take counsel in this matter of the greatest statesman the nation has ever produced. Daniel Webster, at the dedication of Bunker Hill Monument, in 1825, made use of this language, as true and as applicable to-day as when he uttered it:

If the true spark of religious and civil liberty be kindled it will burn. Human agency can not extinguish it. Like the earth's central fire, it may be smothered for a time, the ocean may overwhelm it, mountains may press it down, but its inherent and unconquerable force will heave both the ocean and the land, and at some time or other, in some place or other, the volcano will break out and flame up to heaven.

Every colonizing country on earth that has had other nations in subjection shows that it has been the fountain and source of all corruption and destroyed the ancient republics of the world. Greece existed in unmitigated splendor and colonized as much as any nation, but never in any instance did she attempt to retain rule over her colonies, but undertook to extend her domains over all her colonies, with the result attributed to this, that corruption overthrew the mighty power of Rome.

But we may be told that organized resistance in the Philippines is substantially at an end. This may be true; but if true, what need for the 30,000 soldiers now in the archipelago? Because we are making war upon a people, not merely upon organized armies in resistance; our mission is to subjugate the people and force them to submission and compel them to take the oath of allegiance. We have followed them to their homes, to their convents, their churches, to the jungles and the mountains, arresting every man who dares to lisp his aspirations for independence for his native land. We have gathered men, women, and children into reconcentrado camps, carrying out the wishes and orders of at least one general in making the inhabitants "want peace, and want it badly." Hence the necessity for a large standing army there to-day; and if necessary to-day for the purposes for which it is used, when, pray tell me, will there be less necessity for an army for like purposes? You may cry, Peace, peace, but there will be no peace.

A people bayoneted into peace, a people shot and stoned and burned into peace, are never loyal, peaceable citizens. The fire of hate and insurrection is ever smoldering, ready to break out when opportunity presents itself. This people may know not what is best for their present and future welfare; but they have heard of independence, they have prayed for liberty, they have been anxious to be free men for these many, many years. They have witnessed the prosperity, contentment, and wonderful growth and development of the American people enjoying liberty and independence. They believe they can imitate us—at least they wish to try the experiment, to take the risk—and they will never be content until the opportunity is given them and the trial made. Why should we of all people deny them this privilege? Is it because their liberty stands in the pathway of our commercial advancement and expansion in the Orient? God forbid!

What, then, Mr. Chairman, is our duty toward the Filipinos? I answer, Announce to them this day that if they will lay down their arms, submit to our authority, and acknowledge our sovereignty and keep the peace, self-government shall be accorded them and they shall be permitted to declare their independence and set up an independent republic of their own just as soon as they shall demonstrate their fitness and ability to do so.

Is liberty to be confined to any class or race or country? I answer, No. Do we regret that we bound ourselves to permit Cuba to be free and independent? Are not the Filipinos as competent for self-government as the Cubans?

LIBERTY FOR ALL.

They tell me, Liberty, that in thy name
I may not plead for all the human race;
That some are born to bondage and disgrace;
Some to a heritage of woe and shame,
And some to power supreme and glorious fame.
With my whole soul I spurn the doctrine base,
And, as an equal brotherhood, embrace
All people, and for all fair freedom claim!

Know this, O man! whate'er thy earthly fate,
God never made a tyrant or a slave.
Woe, then, to those who dare to desecrate
His glorious image! for to all He gave Eternal rights, which none may violate;
And, by a mighty hand, the oppressed He yet shall save!

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusets [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to many of the speeches which have been made upon this bill, both in the Senate and in the House, and am prepared to support the measure.

But while I shall vote for the bill, I do not altogether approve of that section which relates to the coinage of silver. I am free to admit that, under the circumstances, it may for a time, at least, work well in that far-away country, where they have not yet broken away from the free use of silver.

My objection is that if we are to retain possession of the Philippines and they are to become a part of our nation they should be provided with the same form of currency and with the same standard of money that we have here.

To provide any other system must operate to postpone that full interchange of business relations to which we must look as the real bond of union that is to bring the people of the two countries together.

Whatever system is adopted, however, I am absolutely sure that if the Philippines are to be a part of our own nation it will only be a matter of a short time before our system of currency will be adopted in those islands.

But, Mr. Chairman, I regard the early construction of an isthmian canal as the most important step in our retention and defense of our new Eastern possessions, and I sincerely hope that no difference of opinion as to which route shall be selected—Panama or Nicaragua—will stand in the way of our Government immediately entering upon this work.

Mr. Chairman, since the Hepburn bill left the House the whole aspect of the canal question has changed very much. New light has been thrown upon the situation. The Isthmian Canal Commission has made a new and unanimous report against the Nicaragua and in favor of the Panama route.

In response to very close questioning, the different members of the Commission have pronounced the Panama route the more feasible, the shorter, the more easily constructed, the fewer obstacles to overcome, the less expensive to build, the less costly to maintain, the more easily navigated, and, altogether, the most practical in every way.

This Commission was made up of honorable, independent, and capable men, distinguished as engineers and experts in the construction of great works. They did their work most conscientiously. There is no man who will, I presume, dispute the honest work of this Commission.

Now all this being true, it furnishes abundant reason why any man who has heretofore supported the Nicaragua proposition and who voted for it in the House should change his mind and vote for the Senate amendment. No man who has consistently and conscientiously for all these many years advocated the Nicaragua Canal—talked it, dreamed of it, never having a thought for any other route—need to-day feel that he is recreant to his duty, false to his idol, or chargeable with the least inconsistency by voting for the Senate amendment.

There is enough that is new in the situation to absolve him absolutely from his hitherto faithful adherence to the Nicaragua route.

Both the Panama and Nicaragua in the course of construction will probably develop many surprises, but while in the case of the Nicaragua they are likely to be in the nature of unlooked-for difficulties, in the case of the Panama they are likely to be in the nature of unlooked-for facilities or advantages. Certainly there are more unknown quantities in the Nicaragua than in the Panama.

TITLE.

I do not believe that anyone can successfully assail the title that the Government receives from the French company. It is given by a liquidator or receiver and comes by the way of the courts, and I understand that a title by a receiver through the courts is regarded as one of the best titles that can be given either in France or the United States.

The adoption of the Senate amendment insures a canal at the earliest possible moment.

It practically guarantees that there will never be but one canal. For if it is built the Nicaragua Canal will never be built.

It is the consensus of engineering and expert opinion that the Panama Canal, when completed as a lock canal, can be changed to a sea-level canal. It is only a question of time and money.

I believe that long before the canal is completed, if not when the Government enters upon the work, steps will be taken to make it a sea-level canal, and that, too, without interrupting its use as a lock canal.

The same expert opinion holds it practically an impossibility to make a sea-level canal at Nicaragua.

Panama has less deviations from straight lines, and its curvatures are of larger radii than Nicaragua.

Panama has a lower summit level by 22 feet than Nicaragua, and it is believed that long before completion it will be still further lowered.

The summit level of Nicaragua can never be lower than Lake Nicaragua itself.

The fact that there is a railroad in full operation at Panama simplifies the construction of that canal. The fact that the cost of maintenance of Panama is $1,350,000 less means, at a capitalization at 2 per cent interest, a saving of $65,000,000 over Nicaragua.

The shorter route, the shorter period of transit. The saving in underwriting, the completed harbors at both ends of the Panama Canal, together with many more obvious advantages, constitute sufficient reasons for adopting that route.

The Senate amendment can safely be adopted, because it means a canal at all events.

There can no longer be any force in the claim that a vote for Panama means no canal. The Senate amendment wipes that all out, and any persistent use of such an argument fails of its mark.

If we are to contend for an open door in the Orient, we certainly ought to have an open gate leading to that door through the great roadway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gentleman from Massachusetts yields back the time that he did not occupy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will do so.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman that there is a little necessary business to be transacted, and the order of the House prescribes that the committee shall rise.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Then I yield half a minute.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, a day or two ago we had up the general deficiency bill and there were certain State claims discussed. I asked for certain details from the Treasury Department, but they did not come to me until after my remarks were printed in the RECORD. I only wish to submit these papers as a supplement to my remarks and let them go into the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that leave will be given.

The correspondence is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 18, 1902.

SIR: As requested by you to-day, I have the honor to inclose herewith report from the Auditor for the War Department, addressed to me, having reference to the settlement of the accounts of the States of Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Maine, Rhode Island, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Iowa, reopened and adjusted under the act of February 14, 1902.

Respectfully,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 12, 1902.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: I have the honor to make the following report relative to claims of various States filed in this office for refundment of moneys paid as interest and other expenses incidental to procuring funds to suppress the rebellion in 1861 and subsequent years:

In respect to the action taken upon claims of this nature by the accounting officers of the Treasury prior to the decision of the Supreme Court rendered January 6, 1896, in the case of the State of New York v. United States (160 U. S., 598), it is sufficient to say that such claims were uniformly disallowed, as it was contended by the accounting officers of the Treasury that the act of Congress approved July 27, 1861, under which claims for expenditures incurred in raising troops during the rebellion were filed made no provision for the allowance of claims for interest charges.

The claims covering expenditures of the above nature, which had been filed in the Treasury Department prior to the decision of the Supreme Court above referred to, and the action taken thereon, are herewith set forth:

State.	Amount.	When filed.	Disposition.
Connecticut	$41,363.83	Mar. 14, 1862	Disallowed Dec. 20, 1886.
New York	131,188.02	May 26, 1862	Allowed by Court of Claims; paid June 24, 1896.
Do	65,624.24	Dec. 28, 1891	No action.
Rhode Island	2,754.85	Mar. 4, 1863	Disallowed Aug. 13, 1886.
Illinois	433,112.03	Oct. 14, 1867	Disallowed Oct. 4, 1889.
Indiana	606,979.41	June 8, 1868	Disallowed Oct. 11, 1886.
Do	107,497.21	Oct. 4, 1889	No action.
Kentucky	973,701.62	Jan. 29, 1879	Disallowed Aug. 12, 1886.
Ohio	452,247.89	May 11, 1881	Disallowed Aug. 2, 1886.
Michigan	320,487.81	June 11, 1883	Disallowed Sept. 19, 1893.
Oregon	143,817.87	Aug. 21, 1884	Disallowed Mar. 14, 1889.

There are involved in these claims items of discount, brokerage, printing, and other expenses more fully set forth in Exhibit A, page 22 of Senate Executive Document No. 133, first session Fifty-fifth Congress, as well as claims for interest on delayed payments, and interest actually paid by the States.

The history of the claim of the State of New York, in which the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. 598), in favor of the State, and upon which decision are based the claims of other States subsequently filed, may be briefly set forth as follows:

At the beginning of the war the State of New York was without funds, and in order to properly equip troops the State borrowed on comptroller's bonds $1,250,000, and from the canal fund of the State $518,110.78.

May 26, 1862, the State of New York filed in the Treasury Department a claim against the United States for amounts expended under the act of July 27, 1861, including the items of interest actually paid by the State on funds borrowed as above indicated.

All claims by New York under this act for reimbursement of moneys directly applied in equipping volunteers as aforesaid were allowed and paid or otherwise disposed of by the proper accounting officers, but claims for interest upon moneys borrowed were not allowed.

It was not denied that the moneys realized were applied to promote the raising of troops to aid the United States; in fact, it was clearly shown that the State, with these funds and other resources, raised and put into the field 38 regiments of infantry and furnished large supplies of clothing, arms, and munitions of war in the spring and summer of 1861. It also appears that the principal sums borrowed and so advanced have long since been repaid to the State by the United States, but the action on the item of interest was suspended by the accounting officers, as such charge in their judgment did not come within the purview of the act of 1861, under the provisions of which the claims were filed. In June, 1882, the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted to the Attorney-General all the papers and requested his opinion whether the claim of the State of New York for interest paid by that State on money borrowed and expended in enrolling, etc., its troops employed to aid in the suppression of the rebellion was within the provisions of the act of July 27, 1861.

The opinion given by the Attorney-General under date of July 23, 1883, was in substance that while the interest paid by New York on moneys borrowed and applied to the object specified in the act of 1861 forms a part of the burden borne by that State for the general public defense and constitutes a just charge against the United States, to construe the provisions of that act so as to include such expenditures would be giving them a meaning much broader than that which has in practice been given other legislation of like character and purpose.

It is therefore seen that the opinion of the Attorney-General was unfavorable to the allowance of the charge for interest under the provisions of the act of 1861 and fully coincided with the views of the accounting officers.

At the request of the State the Secretary of the Treasury, on or about January 3, 1889, under the provisions of section 1063, Revised Statutes, United States, transmitted the claim with all the vouchers, papers, briefs, and documents pertaining thereto, to the Court of Claims, there to be proceeded in accordance with law.

The Court of Claims disallowed so much of the State's demands ($39,867.18) as represented interest paid by the State on moneys borrowed from the canal fund, and gave a judgment in favor of the State for $91,320.84, being interest on $1,250,000 comptroller's bonds issued in 1861.

From this judgment the United States appealed to the Supreme Court; the State also appealed.

The Supreme Court, after an exhaustive review of authorities as to the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to entertain and consider the case, refused the motion of the United States to dismiss the appeal of the State, and proceeded to examine the case on its merits.

The Supreme Court confirmed the action of the Court of Claims in giving judgment to the State for $91,320.84, paid as interest on the comptroller's bonds, and held that there was no difference in principle between the claim for $91,320.84 and the claim for $39,867.18. Hence the action of the Court of Claims denying the claim for $39,867.18 was reversed and the case remanded for further action; whereupon the Court of Claims rendered judgment for the amount claimed, viz, $131,188.02. The decision of the Supreme Court is quoted at much length in the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury of April 14, 1902, in the claim of the State of Indiana, as set forth in full below.

Under the decision in the case of the State of New York it was contended before the accounting officers that the prior action in these cases was erroneous, and on December 14, 1896, the State of Pennsylvania filed in the office of the Auditor for the War Department a claim for refundment of $1,864,288.04, alleged to have been paid as interest and other incidental expenses incurred in borrowing the money expended in aiding the United States by raising volunteers in 1861–1865.

On May 24, 1898, the Auditor for the War Department transmitted this claim to the Comptroller of the Treasury for his decision, the Auditor being precluded from favorably considering the claim because of the then existing construction of the act of 1861, as indicated by the decision of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, dated December 29, 1877. (Vol. 3, Dig. 2d Compt. Dec., par. 529.)

The claim was returned by the Comptroller of the Treasury to the Auditor for the War Department August 16, 1898, with opinion, as follows:

"The Auditor for the War Department May 24, 1898, made the following decision, and has submitted the same for approval, disapproval, or modification:

"'I have the honor to transmit herewith the papers in the claim of the State of Pennsylvania, under act of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., 276), for the reimbursement of the sum of $1,864,288.04 for an alleged actual outlay in pay of interest on money borrowed for the purpose of enrolling, subsisting, etc., the troops of the State, and for other items of incidental expenses connected therewith not allowed in the several claims heretofore presented by the State and adjusted by the accounting officers under the act above cited.

"'The State of Pennsylvania has presented from time to time to the Department under this act various claims and accounts, aggregating $3,568,974.82, and there have been allowed and paid to the State amounts as follows: (Vide compilation in Auditor's letter.) The amounts allowed in these settlements include the amounts expended by the State for the use of which the $1,864,288.04 now claimed was expended as interest and incidentals.

"'In his decision of December 17, 1897 (4 Comp. Dec., 328), the Comptroller of the Treasury held that where a claimant has heretofore presented and has been allowed a claim for a part of an entire demand arising out of the same service and in the same right, such partial allowance is a settlement of the whole demand, and the subsequent application for the remainder will be disallowed. In that decision he said, "It is not sufficient excuse to say that at the time of the allowance of the former claim, if presented, it would have been disallowed by the accounting officers under the rules then prevailing. * * * That was the time and forum for settling the entire matter, and it affords no legal excuse for dividing his claim and presenting it piecemeal."

"'In view of this decision, I am of the opinion that the interest paid for the use of the money expended, the cost of floating the loan and the premium paid for gold as claimed in the present demand, are incidental to and so intimately connected with the amount claimed in former settlements as not to constitute a separate demand, and that the settlement of the claims for the principal expended by the State was a disallowance of the amount now claimed. Therefore the claim is forwarded to you as a request for a rehearing under Circular No. 84 of April 25, 1895.

"'Further, if it be held that the claim as presented is not covered by the settlements already made, it can not now be allowed by this office. The question of reimbursement of a State for its actual outlays in payment of interest on money borrowed for the purpose of enrolling, subsisting, etc., the troops of the State under act of July 27, 1861, has been several times passed upon by different Second Comptrollers, and such claims have been uniformly disallowed. (See par. 529, 2d Comp. Dig., vol. 3.)

"'Under the decision of the Supreme Court, in case of the United States v. New York (160 U. S. R., 598), however, I am of the opinion that if the claim now presented were open for consideration, the State would be entitled to reimbursement for the interest paid by the State on moneys borrowed for the purpose of enrolling, subsisting, supplying, etc., troops to be employed in suppressing the rebellion, as well as the other legitimate incidental expenses properly incurred in procuring the money for said purpose, and that the same are part of the "costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred" within the meaning of the act of July 27, 1861.'

"Unless it can be held that the present claim for interest is so intimately connected with the amount claimed in former settlements for the principal expended by the State as to be a part of the same demand, this case is not one on which a request for a rehearing can arise. If it be viewed as a request for rehearing it must be denied, because the evidence now presented is not newly discovered, and no legal reason is seen why it was not presented with the principal claims.

"Viewed as a new claim recently presented, the State would be entitled, under act of July 27, 1861, supra, to reimbursement for amount properly expended as interest on money borrowed to equip troops as part of the 'costs, charges, and expenses' mentioned in the act (see United States v. New York, 160 U. S., 598), provided the claim is now properly before this Department and open for settlement. The decision of the Second Comptroller, found in section 529, volume 3, Second Comptroller's Digest, is hereby reversed. This claim, however, brings up controverted questions of fact and law upon which it seems desirable to obtain the decision of the Court of Claims for the guidance and action of the accounting officers and to furnish a precedent in other cases.

Therefore, if the Auditor deems it proper, it is within his power to transmit the same to that court under the provisions of section 2 of the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat., 485) (Bowman Act). Some of the questions upon which a decision seems desirable may be stated as follows:

"1. Have the accounting officers jurisdiction to entertain, adjust, and settle this claim on its merits under the decision in the case of the United States v. New York (160 U. S., 598)?

"(a) Is this claim for interest on money borrowed and expended in equipping troops so intimately connected with the principal claims already allowed that the interest claim can be held to have been settled in the settlement of the principal claims, on the doctrine that a claimant can not be allowed to split up his cause of action?

"(b) In view of the long delay in presenting this claim, is it a 'stale claim,' which the accounting officers should not entertain, adjust, and settle on its merits?

"2. If the accounting officers have jurisdiction and should settle the claim, for what time ought interest to be allowed?

"(a) Where long-time bonds were issued, should interest be allowed to the maturity of the bonds. If not, to what lesser time should it be allowed?

"(b) Should interest be allowed beyond the time necessary for the State to levy a tax and collect the money required for the principal expenditure?

"3. If the court finds it has jurisdiction to determine the amount due, what amount, if anything, is the State entitled to on the evidence and facts presented?"

Following the suggestions ot the Comptroller in the decision above quoted, the Auditor for the War Department, October 19, 1898, submitted the claim of the State of Pennsylvania to the Secretary of the Treasury for transmittal to the Court of Claims in terms as follows:

"The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

"SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for reference to the Court of Claims, under section 2 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883 (22 Stat., 485), otherwise known as the Bowman Act, and there to be proceeded in according to the provisions of said section, the claim of the State of Pennsylvania, aggregating $1,864,288.04, filed in this office December 14, 1896, for reimbursement of interest on moneys borrowed and expended in raising and putting into the field troops for the service of the United States, in aiding to suppress the rebellion, and also items of incidental expenses connected therewith.

"The section under which the reference is requested reads as follows:

"'SEC. No. 2. When a claim or matter is pending in any of the Executive Departments which may involve controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such department may transmit the same with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt, when the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found; the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the department by which it was transmitted for its guidance and action.'"

"The claim in question and now pending is itemized as follows:

Interest on $475,000 temporary loan authorized by State act of April 12, 1861	$12,533.34
Interest on $3,000,000, ten-year war-loan bonds authorized by State act of May 15, 1861. (Paid by the treasurer of the State of Pennsylvania)	15,040.51
Interest on $3,000,000, ten-year war-loan bonds authorized by State act of May 15, 1861. (Paid through the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, Philadelphia, Pa.)	1,768,636.50
Amount paid as premium on gold	58,303,98
Amount of expenses paid in floating the loan authorized by State act of May 15, 1861	9,773.71

"The State claims reimbursement from the United States for the entire sum under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., 276), which directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the costs, charges, and expenses, properly incurred by such State, for enrolling, supplying, paying, transporting, etc., its troops employed in aiding to suppress the rebellion, to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

By joint resolution of Congress, approved March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., 615), the act of 1861 was construed to apply to expenses incurred after, as well as before, its passage.

"The State of Pennsylvania has presented from time to time to the Department, under the act of July 27, 1861, various claims and accounts (exclusive of the pending claim for interest, etc.) aggregating $3,568,974.82, and there have been allowed and paid to the State at various times sums as follows:

Number and date of settlement.	Amount.	How disposed of.
8689 of 1866	$112.50	Credited to the State Feb. 2, 1866.
	605,887.50	Credited to the State Apr. 24, 1867.
3333 of 1867	1,304,711.43	Carried to credit of State on account of direct tax May 1, 1867.
	78,516.89	Paid to the State May 1, 1867.
8848 of 1868	105,651.46	Paid to the State Oct. 28, 1868.
4444 of 1870	136,846.09	Paid to the State Aug. 26, 1870.
5927 of 1871	137,822.59	Paid to the State Apr. 11, 1871.
6318 of 1871	242,167.57	Paid to the State May 15, 1871.
6685 of 1871	208,753.08	Paid to the State June 23, 1871.
7358 of 1875	2,865.61	Paid to the State Aug. 11, 1875.
4742 of 1877	58,490.41	Paid to the State Oct. 29, 1877.

"The amounts allowed in these settlements include the amounts expended by the State for the use of which the $1,864,288.04 now claimed was paid as interest and incidentals.

"This claim, however, presents controverted questions of law and facts, upon which it seems desirable to obtain the decision of the Court of Claims for the guidance and action of this office. The questions upon which a decision seems desirable may be stated as follows:

"1. Have the accounting officers jurisdiction to entertain, adjust, and settle this claim on its merits under the decision in the case of the United States v. New York (160 U. S., 598)?

"(a) Is this claim for interest on money borrowed and expended in equipping troops so intimately connected with the principal claims already allowed that the interest claim can be held to have been settled in the settlement of the principal claims on the doctrine that a claimant can not be allowed to split up his cause of action?

"(b) In view of the long delay in presenting this claim, is it 'a stale claim,' which the accounting officers should not entertain, adjust, or settle on its merits?

"2. If the accounting officers have jurisdiction and should settle the claim, for what time ought interest to be allowed?

"(a) Where long-time bonds were issued, should interest be allowed to the maturity of the bonds; if not, to what lesser time should it be allowed?

"(b) Should interest be allowed beyond the time necessary for the State to levy a tax and collect the money required for the principal expenditure?

"3. If the court finds it has jurisdiction to determine the amount due, what amount, if anything, is the State entitled to on the evidence and facts presented?

"I transmit all the papers, proofs, documents, etc., pertaining to the claim, as required."

Subsequent to the filing of the claim of the State of Pennsylvania, other States filed claims of a similar nature, which were likewise transmitted to the Court of Claims, through the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the suggestions of the Comptroller of the Treasury, under section 2 of the Bowman Act, as follows:

The Court of Claims on October 28, 1901, rendered an opinion in the claim of the State of Pennsylvania v. United States (36 Ct. of Cls., 507), as follows:

"Howry, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

"The findings establish payment by plaintiff of certain incidental expenses and large sums by way of interest on account of certain temporary and extended loans made on obligations of the State of Pennsylvania (for which as to the long-time loans registered and coupon bonds were duly authorized and issued) for money borrowed and used by the State in enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops, under the act of Congress approved July 27, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 276), and the joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat. L. 615).

"But the State did not present any claim on account of these expenditures until December 14, 1896, alleging as an excuse therefor that prior to the time when the claim accrued the accounting officers of the Treasury, as well as the Attorney-General of the United States, had decided that the act of 1861, supra, did not give the Secretary of the Treasury jurisdiction to adjust and settle claims for expenditures on account of interest, in consequence of which the State deferred presentation of its claim until the Supreme Court of the United States determined in the case of the State of New York against the United States (160 U. S. R., 598) that similar expenditures for interest were recoverable. Thereupon the claim was presented to the Treasury, but the Secretary, deeming that controverted questions of law and fact had risen in considering the matter of any payment at all, or if payable that uncertainty existed as to the method of adjustment, transmitted the record pertaining to the matter to this court, under the provisions of section 2 of the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 485), with certain inquiries now to be considered.

"No doubt exists as to the justice of this demand for interest expended. Such expenditures when actually disbursed became a part of the aggregate principal properly paid by the State for the General Government, according to the decision in United States v. New York. (160 U. S. R., 621.) So by this decision no question arises as to the propriety of the expenditures for interest.

"But it is argued for defendants that Pennsylvania did not claim anything for interest on money borrowed for a period of more than thirty years after all her other claims had been presented and substantially adjusted and paid, which must be taken as proof that the present claim is stale; that the effect of its being withheld, together with claimant's acquiescence in the rulings of the Treasury Department, establishes staleness, which necessarily excludes any payment whatever now; and further, that as claimant did not bring suit in this court within the statutory period of limitation, the Secretary should be advised that such failure works an estoppel upon the belated assertion of the demand; that the claim is too intimately connected with the principal claims already allowed to admit of further consideration, because the State can not be allowed to so divide its original cause of action as to be entitled to further payments. * * *

"Thus it will be seen that there is precedent for the anomaly that the statute of limitations may apply to a right of action in this court, and not for an accounting at the Treasury.

"The door for settlement at the Treasury may not always be open, however, by reason of the laches of the claimants so operating upon the rights of the Government as to cause prejudice to its interests, or the conduct of the claimant be such as to estop the further assertion of the demand. * * *

"While there must at some time or another be an end of accounting, and creditors of the Government must not unreasonably delay presenting their demands, and while it is true an equitable bar may sometimes arise from lapse of time in cases not strictly within any statute of limitation, it is also true that circumstances may relieve the failure to present if it does not appear that the relative position of the parties has changed.

"Here, it appears, the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania authorized its obligations, with interest, for the purposes stated in the act of 1861; the State records contain the numbers of the obligations and the amounts for which they were respectively issued, and the archives disclose possession of these evidences of debt, together with the data necessary to determine the precise sums expended. The details of the transactions are as accessible now as ever. The accounting officers of the Treasury erroneously declared, very early after similar demands were presented, that reimbursements for interest expenditures were not payable to any State. Their action was accepted as correct by the Secretary and his course was approved by the chief law officer of the Government. The United States lost no right and the State gained no advantage by the nonpresentation of the claim. Under these circumstances it would be a harsh application of the rule respecting diligence to now say that the Secretary had lost jurisdiction because of his erroneous decision and the inaction of the State because of that mistaken view of his authority.

"Especially would such a declaration appear to be unjust and wholly technical in view of the continued presentation of claims and payment, under the statute, of other war claims of the State of Pennsylvania. Beginning March 1, 1862, and ending December 5, 1892, 16 separate claims were presented by the Commonwealth; and during the time extending to March 12, 1895, the Treasury made as many as 25 separate payments. The intervening time from the presentation of the last allowed claim of the State to the presentation of its final demand was something under five years. Large items in the claims already adjusted were presented twenty years or more after such items had accrued. If the unpaid claim now being considered can not be settled for want of a place of adjustment, or for staleness, or because of the bar of the period of limitation, in case of suit, then some of the claims heretofore settled would seem to have been unlawfully paid.

"Such a distinction in the practice of the Treasury Department in dealing with proper expenditures of plaintiff should not operate as an estoppel even though it appears the State paid its last installment of interest on its bonds in 1872. The doctrine of estoppel for failure to present, a doctrine not favored in the law, can not be invoked by the party whose officers erroneously decided presentation to be a useless proceeding. Estoppel might arise against a party where his own conduct has caused another to act differently from a course which otherwise such person might pursue without reference to a statute of limitation. It can not rest by mere silence upon a departmental ruling adverse to jurisdiction, with no additional rights acquired by a claim and no injury done to the debtor in the meantime.

"The respective payments of interest were disassociated from the payments of other lawful expenditures of plaintiff. These payments were made at separate times and from funds raised by taxation. In dividing its accounts, the State was excused from presenting all the claims together by the practice of the Treasury in dealing with the various expenditures.

"Other questions relate to the time interest ought to be allowed; that is, treating the interest payments as principal under the decision in the New York case, whether interest shall be allowed to maturity on the ten-year bonds of the State or to the time when they were redeemed.

"The method of raising money by Pennsylvania was not in the main different from that adopted by the State of New York, except as to the length of time the bonds had to run. The loan on the ten-year bonds in 1861 covered a shorter period than any loan made to the State prior to 1860. Loans had been generally obtained before that time payable in from twenty-five to thirty years. The act of 1861 and the supplemental joint resolution to that act did not restrict the State in the means it should adopt to raise the money. The United States agreed to reimburse all costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred. If long-time bonds were needlessly issued a different question would arise, but it has not been made to appear that the credit of the State was uselessly or improvidently put forth, or that it was not the quickest way of raising money for the purposes it was immediately wanted. It does not appear that the ready cash was in the State treasury at the time.

"It is true the State might have raised the large amounts needed by direct taxation upon its citizens. In the stress of the times that may have been proper, but certainly not most expedient. It was deemed best, in the exercise of the sovereign power of the State, to raise revenue for some of its public purposes by authorizing and issuing bonds. The emergency was great, and the good faith of the State in the premises has never been nor can ever be questioned. Under these circumstances it can not be said that the interest expended was improper.

"Besides the items of expenditure by way of interest, expenses were incurred by the State in negotiating a loan on $3,000,000 of its obligations under an act of the legislature of May 15, 1861, which authorized the State to issue bonds for the purposes named in the act of Congress. There was also expended for premiums on gold in the payment of interest on these bonds the amount shown by the report of the auditor. The expenses incurred in negotiating the loan amounted to $9,773.71, and the premium on gold aggregated $58,303.98.

"The court will take judicial notice of the history of the times, of the financial conditions prevailing throughout the country, and other circumstances affecting the public credit in the efforts of the State to float its bonds. That difficulty existed in the attempt to use the credit of the State to the best advantage appears certain, and in securing the services of a fiscal agent to facilitate the negotiation of its bonds without loss and paying the sum proven to have been paid we think the expenditure was proper. The disbursements on this account have the additional merit of being entirely reasonable.

"The payment of premiums on gold were a necessity at the time. The terms of the State's contract required specie payments. Gold was at a premium, and with the advancing storm of war continued to rise in value. The authorities of the State were fortunate in not having (by mere delay) to pay more of a premium on the gold necessary to meet the interest on the bonds of the State as that interest fell due.

"The amount of direct tax chargeable against the State under the act of August 5, 1861 (12 Stat. L., 295), was formally credited in the Treasury Department some time after it became due and chargeable. Under an apportionment of this direct tax to the several States the quota of Pennsylvania was fixed at $1,946,719.33. The balance due by the State after deducting the 15 per cent provided by the act imposing the tax was $1,654,711.44. There was sufficient recognition on June 30, 1862, by the United States of its liability to reimburse the State for its expenditures as to justify credit to the State of the amount of the direct tax as of the date above given. The fact that difficulties subsequently arose in the adjustment of the State's accounts, as presented in June, 1862, and that various items may have been rejected, does not prove that the United States denied its liability to the State for what was properly due to it. The controversy over the accounts related to the correctness and propriety of the disbursements and to the details of the claim as presented by the State, and not to any denial of liability for whatever was shown to be proper. For this and the reasons set forth in the contemporaneous opinion, in the case of the State of Maine, the amount of direct tax should be credited as of the date stated, namely, June 30, 1862.

"Summarizing the considerations stated and directly answering the inquiries propounded by the Secretary, we hold:

"1. That the accounting officers have jurisdiction to entertain, adjust, and settle this claim on its merits under the decision in the case of the United States v. New York (160 U. S., 598).

"2. That interest paid by the State of Pennsylvania be allowed.

"3. Interest should be allowed beyond the time necessary for the State to levy a tax and collect the money required for the principal expenditure.

"4. This claim for interest paid out by the State on money borrowed and expended in equipping troops under the act of 1861 is not so intimately connected with the principal claims already allowed that the present claim can be held to have been settled in the adjustment of the principal claims.

"5. Settlement of the claim in the Treasury is not barred by any statute of limitation, nor is it a stale claim which the accounting officers should not entertain, adjust, or settle on its merits.

"6. The accounting officers having jurisdiction, the claim should be adjusted by allowing the State interest from the dates of the several loans made by it to raise money necessary to organize and equip troops, for which the United States promised indemnity by the act of 1861, up to the date or dates when the Government recognized the claims for the money so advanced, deducting therefrom the amount of direct tax chargeable against said State as of the date when due and chargeable, to wit, June 30, 1862.

"7. Under the rule stated, and by direction of the court, the auditor to whom this case was referred to take and state the account has filed an amended report. By it the amount shown to be due is $689,442.13. This sum includes the expenses incurred in negotiating the loan and the premiums on gold, as well as the claim for interest expended. The amended report, which the court adopts as its findings of fact, is based upon the charge to the State of its quota of the direct tax and the credit of the amount of this tax as of June 30, 1862, and not upon the amount claimed in the petition and credited to the State, under its contention and the auditor's original report, at a later date."

The opinion of the Court of Claims in the claim of the State of Maine v. United States (36 Court of Claims, 531) was rendered on the same date, as follows:

"Peelle, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

"The claim in this case was transmitted to the court by the Secretary of the Treasury by the following communication:

"Under the reference thus made the claimant filed a petition herein on the 23d day of March, 1899, and thereafter, by consent of both parties, the case was referred to the auditor of the court to investigate and take testimony and to report the facts to the court; and that having been done, the Auditor files his report herein; and no exceptions having been filed thereto, and the same being in conformity with the evidence, the court adopts the same.

"The regular session of the Maine legislature for the year 1861 met the first Wednesday in January and finally adjourned March 16, having made the annual appropriations for State purposes and levied the State tax for the current year, and on April 15, 1891, the date of the first call for troops, there was not, nor would there be during that year, any money in the State treasury which was not specifically appropriated for State purposes, and no money which could be used to defray the expenses of enlisting, enrolling, arming, equipping, and mustering troops into the service of the United States. To provide ways and means for those purposes an extra session of the Maine legislature was called, which met April 22 and adjourned April 25, 1861. This extra session passed an act (chapter 60, Public Laws, extra session, Maine, 1861) authorizing the governor to raise and equip ten regiments, and appropriated $1,000,000 therefor, and also passed a resolve authorizing a loan of $1,000,000 to provide for said appropriation.

"Pursuant to said resolve Maine issued and sold bonds to the amount of $800,000 and no more, all being payable in ten years from their date and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, the then legal rate in Maine, payable semiannually, according to the coupons attached to the bonds.

"Said bonds were issued in installments as follows: $250,000, May 10, 1861; $300,000, July 1, 1861; $250,000, August 1, 1861, and sold for $800,000, their full face value, and a premium of $3,087.50.

"The issue and sale of all these bonds was necessary to provide the money required, and the full amount of their face value, together with the premium and other moneys, was expended by Maine for war purposes.

"Maine paid the principal of each and every of said $800,000 bonds at maturity, together with the interest coupons thereon as the same became due to the amount of $480,000 for the ten years, and after such payments both the bonds and the coupons were destroyed according to law.

"All the items and vouchers therefor for which said $800,000 was expended are included in claim No. 1, made by Maine for reimbursement to the amount of $1,075,274.36, as appears in the above Table 1.

"Said $800,000 was expended by Maine as aforesaid in sums corresponding to the three several bond issues, as follows: $250,000, from April 29 to July 1, 1861, of which the Treasury Department of the United States allowed $208,265.91 and disallowed $41,734.09; $300,000, from July 1 to August 3, 1861, of which $214,338.44 was allowed and $85,661.56 disallowed, and $250,000, from August 3 to September 21, 1861, of which $213,933.44 was allowed and $36,066.53 disallowed. In the aggregate of said $800,000 the accounting officers of the Treasury Department allowed $636,537.79 and disallowed $163,462.21.

"Said allowed sum of $636,537.79 was borrowed by the State of Maine, as above set forth, and expended for purposes properly chargeable to the United States, and for the same the United States has reimbursed Maine under the provisions of the act of Congress above mentioned.

"Maine received from the United States $200,000 September 12, 1861, and $120,000 March 7, 1862, and all of the $320,000 so received, and more, was expended by Maine subsequent and in addition to the $800,000 derived from the bonds and for items allowed by the Treasury Department, as appears in the above Table 1. Had it not been for said payments of $200,000 and $120,000 Maine would have been obliged to issue the remaining $300,000 bonds authorized by the appropriation, and also compelled to borrow large sums of money in addition thereto to meet her expenditures for war purposes.

"Maine assumed her quota of the direct tax levied under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, by reason of which there was due and payable from Maine to the United States $357,702.10 June 30, 1862, on which date said sum was credited by Maine to the United States, but it appears that the latter did not charge it off as paid until March 2, 1867 (item No. 2237, Table 11).

"Maine received from the United States, March 18, 1867, $184,462.12; April 22, 1867, $10,000; November 29, 1867, $10,682.23, and December 16, 1867, $4,000. The first, second, and fourth of the preceding items together make the third item in the above Table 11, appearing there as $198,462.12 under date of March 2, 1867. All other items of payment by the United States to Maine are the same as the items of like amount in said table, and the differences between the dates in the table and those in the Maine treasury are accounted for by the difference in time between the drawing of the warrant by the Treasurer of the United States and the receipt of the funds by the treasurer of Maine.

"On March 18, 1867, the date of the receipt by Maine of the payment of $184,462.12, made by the United States, there was due Maine a balance of $64,387.28 in addition to the $636,537.79 above mentioned as allowed by the Treasury Department, which said balance of $64,387.28 is determined thus: Claims filed by Maine in 1862 and 1863 were allowed by the United States to the amount of $917,539.68 (Table 1), of which there was paid by Maine the allowed sum of $636,537.79 from the proceeds of the $800,000 bonds, as above stated. This left a balance of allowed claims amounting to $281,001.89, and this, deducted from the $320,000 paid by the United States to Maine (first two items Table 11), left a credit balance of $38,998.11; but Maine filed a further claim, which was allowed, to the amount of $103,385.38 (item 4, Table 1), from which subtract said credit balance of $38,998.11, and there is left the balance of $64,387.28, claimed by Maine as aforesaid. The same result is reached by adding said $281,001.89, balance allowed claims, and the further allowed amount of $103,385.39, and from their sum ($384,387.28) subtracting said $320,000, which leaves the same balance of $64,387.28 first above mentioned.

"On September 19, 1868, Maine received from the United States a payment of $127,473.34, which is the item appearing in Table 11, under date of September 5, 1868.

"On October 29, 1868, Maine received from the United States a payment of $6,728.96, which is the item appearing in Table 11 under date of October 16, 1868, and it was in payment of a claim by Maine for that amount filed with the Treasury Department August 8, 1868, the same being item 5 of Table 1, and it covers charges not included in any item of payment heretofore mentioned.

"Upon the foregoing findings the State of Maine claims as per the following statement and figures furnished by counsel for claimant, all the computations of which I find to be correct:

Statement of amount claimed by the State of Maine to reimburse it for interest paid on moneys borrowed and expended for the United States.

Of the $250,000 borrowed May 10, 1861, the State expended $208,265.91 for purposes which the Government allowed as proper charges.
Interest on $208,265.91, May 10, 1861, to June 30, 1862		$14,231.50
Of the $300,000 borrowed July 1, 1861, the State expended $214,338.44 for purposes which the Government allowed as proper charges.
Interest on $214,338.44, July 1, 1861, to June 30, 1862		12,860.31
Of the $250,000 borrowed August 1, 1861, the State expended $213,933.44 for purposes which the Government allowed as proper charges.
Interest on $213,933.44, August 1, 1861, to June 30, 1862		11,766.34
Expenditures for allowed items as follows:
May 10, 1861	$208,265.91
July 1, 1861	214,338.44
August 1, 1861	213,933.44
Total interest on same to June 30, 1862		38,858.15
June 30, 1862, Maine received from the United States $357,702.10 (being its quota of the direct tax assumed by it and due that day), which, deducted from the above total of allowed items, leaves a balance of $278,835.69 unpaid and upon which the State was paying interest.
Interest on this balance, June 30, 1862, to March 18, 1867		78,910.50
March 18, 1867, Maine received from the United States payment of $184,462.12. At that time Maine had expended for the United States for allowed items, all subsequent to those making up the $636,537.79 and in excess of the $200,000 and $120,000 advanced it in 1861 and 1862, the sum of $64,387.28, for which it reimbursed itself, leaving $120,074.84 to be applied in reduction of the amount on which it was paying interest for the United States ($184,462.12 less $64,387.28 leaving $120,074.84). The $120,074.84 deducted from the former balance of $278,835.69 leaves $158,760.85 outstanding March 18, 1867.
Interest on this sum, March 18, 1867, to April 22, 1867		899.64
April 22, 1867, the State received $10,000 from the United States, which, deducted from the former balance, leaves $148,760.85 outstanding, on which the State was paying interest for the United States.
Interest on this sum, April 22, 1867, to November 29, 1867		5,380.18
November 29, 1867, the State received from the United States $10,682.23, which, deducted from the former balance, leaves $138,078.62 outstanding, on which the State was paying interest for the United States.
Interest on this sum, November 29, 1867, to December 16, 1867		391.22
December 16, 1867, the State received $4,000 from the United States, which, deducted from the former balance, leaves $134,078.62 outstanding, on which the State was paying interest for the United States.
Interest on this sum, December 16, 1867, to September 19, 1868		6,100.58
September 19, 1868, the State received $127,473.34 from the United States, which, deducted from the former balance, leaves $6,605.28 outstanding, on which the State was paying interest for the United States.
Interest on this sum September 19, 1868, to May 10, 1871, the date on which the first issue of bonds became due and was paid		1,046.93
Total interest paid out by the State upon moneys borrowed used for the United States		131,587.20

"MEMORANDUM.—October 29, 1868, the State received from the United States $6,728.96, to reimburse it for expenditures made for war purposes, but this was in payment of a claim of like amount filed August 8, 1868, and allowed by the Government, which said claim was for expenditures in addition to and not included in any of the allowances previously made and above referred to. This paying, having been made in settlement of the specific claim referred to, has no effect upon the above claim for interest.

"By mutual agreement and request of counsel for the United States and for claimant, the Auditor further reports as follows:

"'Under act of July 27, 1861, the State of Maine filed with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States six accounts, dated, respectively, April 25, 1862, July 28, 1862, July 22, 1863, February 25, 1867, August 8, 1868, and June 19, 1882, on which the Treasury Department allowed and disposed of $1,027,654.03, and none of said accounts contained the present claim.'

"The present claim was filed with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States April 16, 1898.

"Immediately after the act of July 27, 1861, the Treasury Department established a rule rejecting all claims like this one on the grounds that the same were for interest, and that the Government is not liable for interest unless expressly provided for in the contract. And the Attorney-General of the United States, to whom was referred a like claim of the State of New York, on July 23, 1883, rendered an opinion sustaining the Treasury Department rulings on the ground that such claims were for interest and not for principal.

"The Treasury Department continued to rule as aforesaid on all such claims presented up to and including the year 1896, when the Supreme Court of the United States, in New York v. United States (160 U. S., 598), held that claims of the nature of this one are for principal and not interest.

"Among the claims which the Treasury Department ruled as above stated were those of the States of New York and Indiana.

"Consistently with all such rulings, this claim of Maine would not have been favorably considered by the Department if it had been filed at any time prior to the above-mentioned decision of the Supreme Court in 1896.

"Maine presented this claim to the Secretary of the Treasury for audit and payment within a reasonable time after said decision by the Supreme Court.

"All the evidence that ever existed and that could be used on behalf of either of the Government or the claimant with reference to this claim was on said April 16, 1898, the date on which the claim was filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, and still is, accessible to the Government, and no detriment has accrued to the United States by reason of this claim not being filed prior to said April 16, 1898.

"By request of counsel for the claimant, the auditor reports that the law and method of taxation in Maine in 1861, 1862, and 1863 were that the legislature then assembled on the first Wednesday of January in each year, and each session provided for the annual appropriations and for the levying of the yearly State tax, which tax was legally due upon the first day of the January next following, and ordinarily was not actually received into the State treasury until from time to time during the ensuing year.

"Respectfully submitted November 29, 1899.

"HARRY M. CAVIS, Auditor."

The Court of Claims also rendered opinions and certified their findings as to the law and the facts in the claim of the State of New Hampshire, and the claim of the State of Rhode Island.

As provided in section 2 of the Bowman Act, the court did not enter judgment on these claims, but reported its findings to the Treasury Department for its guidance and action.

The amounts found due on the several claims by the court were as follows:

Pennsylvania	$689,442.13
Maine	131,587.20
Rhode Island	146,154.45

Upon settlement of the above claims and the adjustment of clerical differences by the Auditor for the War Department the following amounts were found due, which were certified to Congress for an appropriation:

Pennsylvania	$689,146.24

The amounts allowed by the Auditor were duly appropriated by act of February 14, 1902, and have been paid to the States.

The determination of the above-described claims by the Court of Claims and the Auditor for the War Department and the sanction thereof by Congress in the provisions of the act of February 14, 1902, referred to, having been accepted by the Auditor for the War Department as sufficient authority for his guidance, the Auditor proceeded to consider the claim of the State of Iowa and detailed a special auditor from his office to proceed to Des Moines, Iowa, to examine the State records, procure evidence, take testimony, and make a report upon his investigation as to the merits of the claim. Following are extracts from the special auditor's report:

"At the call for troops by the President of the United States for the suppression of the rebellion, the State of Iowa had no moneys in its State treasury which were not specifically appropriated for the expenses of the State government.

"The State, having no funds which could be used to defray the expense of enlisting, equipping, and mustering troops into the United States service, was compelled to and did issue bonds to the amount of $300,000. Owing to the previous bonded indebtedness of the State, and the financial conditions prevailing at the time, the bonds could not be floated at par value, but were disposed of at a discount, the State realizing but $277,320 from the sale of the bonds, leaving the discount suffered by the State in the sale of $22,680.

"The total amount of money appropriated for war purposes by the State was $1,000,000, and of this amount the State was authorized to issue $300,000 in bonds. The law providing for the issue of these bonds expressly stipulated that so much as was absolutely necessary of the authorized bond issue was only to be perfected and sold as the conditions of the State revenues for war purposes demanded. (Vide Abstract 'A.')

"The evidence shows that by careful and judicious financiering the State succeeded in carrying on the work of equipping troops and putting them into the field with an issue of bonds in the sum of, as stated, $300,000. There was, however, the total amount of the appropriation of $1,000,000 spent, and more. (Vide Statement No. 1, p. 4.)

"To supply the additional amount of the money required, the State used funds received from other sources than from the sale of bonds, to wit: Advances by the United States, $80,000 on September 25, 1861, and $20,000 on April 7, 1862, and the receipts from the Federal or direct taxes. That the use of such direct taxes obviated the necessity of issuing additional bonds to make up the required revenues is shown by the evidence presented and the statements set forth.

"In addition to the sums derived from these specific sources, there were overdrafts made from the general revenues of the State.

"These various sums are shown to have been deposited in the 'war and defense fund' of the State, a fund created by special act of legislature (vide Abstract "A"), which also provided that no warrants except those drawn in payment of military expenditures should be paid from that fund.

"Upon examination of the abstracts filed with the claim of the State of Iowa for civil-war expenditures now on file in the Treasury Department, it is ascertained that the State had expended and otherwise incurred obligations in the amount of $828,687.17 on January 1, 1863. (Vide Table 3, p. 4½.)

"Up to this date the ascertained revenues derived by the State were $100,000 advanced by the United States, $277,320 proceeds from the sale of bonds, and the Federal or 'direct tax' levied under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, which by the interpretation of the above act by the Court of Claims was due and payable on June 30, 1862, in the sum of $384,274.80.

"The amounts derived from the proceeds of the sale of bonds and the sums advanced by the United States are clearly shown to have been inadequate to meet the obligations incurred by the State for military expenditures, the State having used to make up this deficiency the revenues derived from the collection of the 'direct tax.'

"From the evidence submitted as to the disposition of the moneys received from the sources above stated, it does not appear that the State could have judiciously used the moneys derived from the United States or the amounts collected from direct taxes to the liquidation of its interest-bearing obligation, but, on the contrary, was forced to use it for the liquidation of obligations incurred for military supplies and expenses incident to raising troops. It is manifest that using it for other purposes additional sales of bonds in excess of the $300,000 would have been imperative.

"The Supreme Court, in its opinion rendered in the case of the United States v. New York (160 U. S., 598), decided that the moneys spent by the State in procuring funds was as much a part of the principal expenditures as the purchase of military equipments. It also held that the relationship which existed between the United States and the State was one of principal and agent. It therefore follows that the status of principal and agent continues throughout all the transactions authorized by such agency, until a final accounting between principal and agent was had.

"The evidence obtained and based upon the records of the Treasury Department shows that there was no accounting between principal and agent until January 8, 1868. It follows, therefore, that all moneys received by the agent from the principal up to the date of an accounting were to be used for the purpose and in the manner implied by the agency—namely, that of purchasing supplies and equipping troops—as long as the condition existed for which the agency was created.

"During the existence of these conditions, brought on by a state of war, the State continued to carry on the work of equipping troops and incurring obligations to her creditors for military supplies.

"The creditors of the State were paid on warrants drawn on the 'war and defense fund' of the State, into which had been deposited all the available funds at the command of the State from which to meet its obligation incurred incident to the raising of troops.

"The facts stated above, which are supported by the evidence submitted, tend to show that the moneys derived from advancements by the United States and collections by the State of Federal taxes were used in the same manner and for the same purposes as the moneys derived from the sale of bonds.

"Through the same course of reasoning it follows that, owing to the depleted condition of the State treasury, the use of the moneys received from these sources for the payment of military expenditures obviated the necessity of perfecting and selling bonds for an equal amount.

"The findings of the Court of Claims upon interest expenditures of this nature and the determination of the rule and theory of the court was applied to claims wherein the greater portion, if not all, of the moneys expended by the State was procured by the issuance of bonds.

"In the claim now under consideration the conditions are not in all respects analogous to the claims passed upon by the court.

"The proportion of the amount of bonds issued to the amount of the total expenditures properly incurred by the State is found to be but 28 per cent, leaving a large proportion (72 per cent) of the moneys properly expended to be derived from other sources, which the evidence shows was made up of advances by the United States, and sums derived from the collection of the Federal or 'direct tax.'

"The disposition of the moneys derived from the 'direct tax' was not considered by the Court of Claims, although it determined that the 'direct tax,' by the terms of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, was due and payable on June 30, 1862.

"Following this interpretation, and assuming by legal fiction that the 'direct tax' was on such date paid by the State to the United States and immediately, by counter warrant, retransmitted to the State, consideration must be given to the disposition of the moneys so secured by the State, and what bearing such disposition, as adjudged by the evidence in the case, would have upon the strict application of the rule of the Court of Claims in making rests at each advancement of funds by the United States and the application of the 'direct tax' to a corresponding reduction of the interest-bearing principal.

"As before stated, during the time when the State of Iowa received advances from the United States, amounting to $100,000, and the date the 'direct tax' was due (June 30, 1862) in the sum of $384,274.80, the State was carrying on the work of equipping troops and incurring obligations for military expenses.

"These expenses aggregated, on January 1, 1863—and for which vouchers had been presented by creditors of the State—the sum of $828,687.17. In the liquidation of these expenses the State had consumed the amounts advanced, coupled with the amounts realized on the sale of bonds in the aggregate of $377,320, and to the extinguishment of the remainder of the expenses incurred had applied the amounts collected from the 'direct tax.'

"The Court of Claims held in the determination of questions of law and fact in the case of the State of Maine (departmental, No. 57) that by its adoption of the report of the auditor of the court, wherein the evidence showed that the sums advanced by the United States had been applied by the State for military expenses and that the application so made obviated the necessity of issuing more bonds of an equal amount.

"It would therefore seem clear that the decision of the court was that where advancements by the United States or other credits were made, that were used in the same manner as moneys derived from sale of bonds, such advancements or credits would not apply to the reduction of the interest-bearing principal.

"There can be no difference in principle between the sums advanced by the United States and the 'direct tax' collected, provided they were used for the same purposes. It is therefore believed that the rule followed by the court in making a rest on June 30, 1862, and deducting from the interest-bearing principal the amount of the 'direct tax' can not be applied in this case without depriving the States of rights believed to exist under the act of Congress, July 27, 1861, as determined by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of New York v. United States (160 U. S., 598), in construing the intent and meaning of said act.

"Based upon the facts as substantiated by the evidence submitted, and a revision of the case as stated, the amount due the State for moneys expended as interest has been based upon the computation of interest at 7 per cent upon the face value of the bonds from the several dates of their perfection and sale up to the dates when set-offs occur by reason as hereinafter explained.

"Following the principle as laid down in the opinion of the Court of Claims in the Maine case, and applying the rule of making a rest at each date of payment by the United States of moneys susceptible of application to the reduction of the interest-bearing principal, in the computation of interest which should be allowed the State the rule is here applied, as announced, that the State must first be reimbursed its own noninterest-bearing principal—that is, the amount the State expended of her own moneys derived from other sources than from the bond issue and advancements from the United States—before any payment by the United States shall be applied to the reduction of the interest-bearing principal.

"The amount of noninterest-bearing principal is derived as follows: To the amount of bonds sold by the State ($300,000) is added the advancements by the United States, namely, $100,000, and the amount of the 'direct tax' ($384,274.80), making $784,274.80. This amount is that which is foreign to the State's noninterest-bearing principal. This deducted from the total amount of the claim reimbursed the State for civil war expenditures, namely, $1,044,336.84, leaves $260,062.04 as the noninterest-bearing principal.

"Under the theory of the rule as above stated, announced by the Court of Claims in the Maine case, this noninterest-bearing principal must first be paid before any payment is applied to the reduction of the interest-bearing principal. Following this rule, the sums of payment by the United States that will offset this noninterest-bearing principal are as follows:

"One hundred and thirty-five thousand four hundred and forty-two dollars and forty-four cents paid by the United States and credited on the books of the State January 15, 1868, and so much of the payment of $229,827.39 credited on the books of the State July 17, 1869, namely, $124,619.60, as is required to complete the liquidation of the noninterest-bearing principal, leaving of the last-named payment the sum of $105,207.79, which is the amount to be deducted from the interest-bearing principal to be made on account of a payment by the United States.

"On the date this payment occurs (July 17, 1869) a reduction of the $300,000 interest-bearing principal in the amount of $105,207.79 is made, and the reduced principal yields interest up to the next set-off or rest, as shown by the computation hereinafter set forth.

"All other expenditures incurred by the State which have been included in this account have been properly verified with the records of the State of Iowa, and are believed to be proper expenditures on the part of the State within the purview of the act of July 27, 1861."

(The sales of bonds by the State covered a period from July 29, 1861, to June 9, 1862, and on June 30, 1862, the accrued interest from the various dates of sale up to June 30, 1862, is shown to be $11,216.24. On June 30, therefore, the interest-bearing principal is the full amount of the bond sales ($300,000). This amount yields interest, as before explained, up to July 17, 1869.)

Act of Congress approved February 14, 1902, made provision for the reopening and examination for allowance of claims for refundment of interest that had been disallowed under the ruling of the Treasury Department prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the State of New York v. United States (160 U. S., 598). The act of February 14, 1902, provides as follows:

"In refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers, namely:

"To the State of Maine, $131,515.81.

"To the State of Pennsylvania, $689,146.29.
"To the State of New Hampshire, $108,372.53.
"To the State of Rhode Island, $124,617.79.
"And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congres of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., p. 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of New York against the United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 United States Reports, p. 598), not heretofore allowed, or heretofore disallowed, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers."

As the claims heretofore disallowed had had their final adjudication by the Second Comptroller the above act vested exclusive jurisdiction to reopen and allow such claims in the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Under the authority thus vested the Comptroller of the Treasury took up for adjudication the claim of the State of Indiana, which had been disallowed on October 11, 1886, in the amount of $606,979.41, together with a claim disallowed by the Auditor for the War Department on April 10, 1902, in the amount of $121,327.21, and upon a rehearing and revision, April 14, 1902, certified the amount of $635.859.20 due the State, in accordance with his decision of the same date, as follows:

"The State of Indiana, on the 8th day of June, 1868, under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., 262), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., 614), making provisions for the reimbursement of States on account of the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by them for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting their troops employed to aid in suppressing the war of the rebellion, filed its certain claim against the United States with the Auditor for the War Department, then called the Second Auditor, wherein said State claimed that the United States was justly indebted to it on account of interest paid on certain war bonds issued by it in order to raise money and used by it for the purposes mentioned in said act and resolutions, supra, and for discount suffered by it for the negotiation of said bonds, and for certain expenses incurred by its commissioners who negotiated said bonds, and for certain losses in exchange incurred for the payment of the semiannual interest on said bonds, said interest being by the terms of said bonds payable in New York City, and for certain payments made by it for printing, expressage, and other incidental expenses accruing out of said bond issue.

"The claim includes interest paid out by the State on said bonds up to and including the 1st day of May, 1868.

"The amount of said claim was for $606,979.41.

"The Auditor, on the 26th day of September, 1886, disallowed said claim in toto, and under the system of accounting then in vogue certified the result of said audit to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury for final disposition.

"This installment is a claim filed by the State of Indiana against the United States for reimbursement of discount, expenses, and interest on war-loan bonds. It was filed in this office June 8, 1868, for the sum of $606,979.41, under act of Congress approved July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., 276).

"It is the declared policy of the United States not to pay claims of this character unless provided for by special contracts or special laws. It will not be contended that any express authority is contained in the act of July 27, 1861, to reimburse the items composing this installment, and under the rule laid down by the late Attorney-General (9 Op. Att. Gen., 59), that authority can not be taken by mere inference.

"The amount of $606,979.41 is therefore disallowed and certified to the Second Comptroller for his action thereon

"The said Second Comptroller, on the 11th day of October, 1886, confirmed the action of the said auditor and diaallowed said claim in toto, in language as follows:

"'The foregoing report of the auditor of the 29th ultimo, is approved. The balance of $606,979.41 is accordingly disallowed and the settlement of said eighth installment of the claim of the State of Indiana under the act of July 27, 1861, is hereby completed and finally closed.'

"The State of Indiana, on the 24th of March, 1899, through Dudley & Michener, its attorneys, filed with the Comptroller of the Treasury a petition to reopen the said settlement of said claim as made by the Second Comptroller, and asked therein that the same after being reopened, be referred by the Comptroller to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

"On the 19th day of September, 1899, the State was denied a reopening of said claim by the Comptroller, for the reason that the said Comptroller was not authorized by law to reopen claims settled by his predecessor on a construction of law, however erroneous said construction may have been. (6 Comp. Dec., 236.)

"Under the act of Congress making appropriations for urgent deficiencies for the present fiscal year, approved February 14, 1902, it is provided:

"'In refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers, namely:

To the State of Maine	$131,515.81
To the State of Pennsylvania	689,146.29
To the State of New Hampshire	108,372.53
To the State of Rhode Island	124,617.79

"'And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., p. 226), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., p. 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of New York against The United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. R., p. 598), not heretofore allowed, or heretofore disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and, if deemed necessary, shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.'

"The claim of the State of Indiana, disallowed by the Second Comptroller on the said 11th day of October, 1886, is a claim of like character with the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island in said act set out and mentioned. Therefore, under and by authority of said act, and at the request of the State of Indiana through its attorney-general, the Hon. William L. Taylor, the said claim of the State of Indiana is now reopened, and will be settled and allowed under the rule of construction given to said acts of indemnity as announced by the Supreme Court in the case of New York v. United States (160 U. S., 598).

"The State of Indiana, by the Hon. William L. Taylor, its attorney-general, on the 1st day of April, 1902, filed a new and separate claim with the Auditor for the War Department for interest accrued and paid on the bonds mentioned in the first claim herein after the 1st day of May, 1868, in the sum of $121,327.21.

"The Auditor for the War Department disallowed, by certificate No. 18418, said last-mentioned claim in toto on the 10th day of April, 1902, for the reasons as follows:

"'This claim is for interest paid by the State from May 1, 1868, to the redemption of its interest-bearing bonds.

"'By an examination of the records and other evidence on file in the Treasury Department, it is shown that on May 1, 1868, the State had redeemed bonds in the amount of $1,776,000. The remainder of the $2,000,000 issued, or $224,000, upon which the State claims interest from May 1, 1868, to May 1, 1881, is shown to have been offset by the United States through the direct tax, which, by the decision of the Court of Claims, was due and payable on June 30, 1862.

"'The amount of the direct tax to be paid by Indiana was, in addition to what had been paid by the State, $700,442.43, which eliminated the principal of $224,000 on that date (June 30, 1862).

"'Under the principle announced in the opinion of the Court of Claims in the claims of the following States: Maine, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island, the payment of interest by the State of Indiana after May 1, 1868, is held to be an unreasonable expense as contemplated by the acts of July 27, 1861, and March 8, 1862.'

"From this action of the Auditor the State of Indiana appealed to the Comptroller for revision on the said 10th day of April, 1902.

"In order that the entire claim of Indiana for reimbursement on account of interest paid on its war bonds, discounts suffered on the negotiations of the same, expenses incurred in negotiating the same, and exchange, expressage, printing, and all other expenses properly incurred on account of said bond issue may be considered and adjusted at one time—the only way in which an intelligent understanding of the claim can be had—I have consolidated said two claims and will consider them as one claim, but certify my action therein separately as to each of said claims.

"These claims, as directed by Congress, are to be allowed under the principles announced in the New York case, supra, as laid down by the Supreme Court in that decision. Hence it is of prime importance to understand what were the facts in the New York case and the law announced by the Supreme Court as applicable to these facts.

"The case is long and the facts voluminous. I will therefore content myself with a résumé only of the decisive facts in that case:

"New York had pending in the Court of Claims a claim wherein it was asserted that the United States was indebted to it in the sum of $131,188.02, for interest paid out by it on war bonds and to the canal sinking fund of the State, the proceeds of such bonds and such money borrowed from her sinking fund having been used by her with which to raise and equip her troops for the civil war.

"The Court of Claims gave judgment in favor of the State of New York for $91,320.84, the amount of interest she had paid on the war bonds, but refused to give judgment for the balance of $39,867.18, representing interest paid by the State to her canal fund for sums borrowed from said fund.

"The Government and the claimant both appealed from the judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court. The judgment of the Court of Claims was reversed in this appeal, for the reason that the State of New York was also entitled to a judgment for the said sum of $39,867.18, the amount paid by it as interest on moneys received by it by way of loan from its canal fund and applied by the State for the purpose of arming and equipping its troops.

"I know of no better way to state the principles announced in that case than to quote the decision bodily, commencing at the second paragraph on page 619 thereof, which part of the decision recites the pertinent facts upon which the judgment of the Supreme Court is based and lays down the principles of law upon which the liability of the Government was based to reimburse the States for moneys paid out by them in the raising and equipping of troops:

"'The entire sum for which the State asked judgment was $131,188.02, of which $91,320.84 represented the amount paid as interest on moneys borrowed for the purpose of raising troops for the national defense, and for the repayment of which, with interest at 7 per cent, the State executed its short-time bonds. The balance, $39,867.18, represented the amount paid as interest on moneys received by way of loan from canal fund and applied by the State for the same purpose.

"'On behalf of the Government it is contended that payment by the United States of the above sum of $91,320.84 is prohibited both by the statute, act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat., c. 92, 765; Rev. Stat., sec. 1091), providing that interest shall not be allowed on any claim up to the time of rendition of judgment thereon by the Court of Claims, unless upon a contract expressly stipulating for the payment of interest, and by the general rule based on grounds of public convenience, that interest "is not to be awarded against a sovereign government unless its consent to pay interest has been manifested by an act of its legislature, or by a lawful contract of its executive officers." (United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 211, 216; Angarica v. Bayard, 127 U. S., 251, 260.)

"'The allowance of the $91,320.84 would not contravene either the statute or the general rule to which we have adverted. The duty of suppressing armed rebellion having for its object the overthrow of the National Government was primarily upon that Government and not upon the several States composing the Union. New York came promptly to the assistance of the National Government by enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting troops to be employed in putting down the rebellion. Immediately after Fort Sumter was fired upon its legislature passed an act appropriating $3,000,000, or so much thereof as was necessary, out of any moneys in its treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray any expenses incurred for arms, supplies, or equipments for such forces as were raised in that State and mustered into the service of the United States. In order to meet the burdens imposed by this appropriation the real and personal property of the people of New York were subjected to taxation.

"'When New York had succeeded in raising 30,000 soldiers to be employed in suppressing the rebellion, the United States, well knowing that the national existence was imperiled and that the earnest cooperation and continued support of the States was required in order to maintain the Union, solemnly declared by the act of 1861 that "the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred" by any State in raising troops to protect the authority of the nation would be met by the General Government. And to remove any possible doubt as to what expenditures of a State would be so met, the act of 1862 declared that the act of 1861 should embrace expenses incurred before as well as after its approval. It would be a reflection upon the patriotic motives of Congress if we did not place a liberal interpretation upon those acts and give effect to what we are not permitted to doubt was intended by their passage.

"'Before the act of July 27, 1861, was passed the Secretary of State of the United States telegraphed to the governor of New York acknowledging that that State had then furnished 50,000 troops for service in the war of the rebellion and thanking the governor for his efforts in that direction. And on July 25, 1861, Secretary Seward telegraphed: "Buy arms and equipments as fast as you can. We pay all." And on July 27, 1861, that "Treasury notes for part advances will be furnished on your call for them." On August 16, 1861, the Secretary of War telegraphed to the governor of New York: "Adopt such measures as may be necessary to fill up your regiments as rapidly as possible. We need the men. Let me know the best the Empire State can do to aid the country in the present emergency." And on February 11, 1862, he telegraphed: "The Government will refund the State for the advances for troops as speedily as the Treasury can obtain funds for that purpose." Liberally interpreted it is clear that the acts of July 27, 1861, and March 8, 1862, created on the part of the United States an obligation to indemnify the States for any costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred for the purposes expressed in the act of 1861, the title of which shows that its object was "to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States."

"'So that the only inquiry is whether, within the fair meaning of the latter act, the words "costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred" included interest paid by the State of New York on moneys borrowed for the purpose of raising, subsisting, and supplying troops to be employed in suppressing the rebellion. We have no hesitation in answering this question in the affirmative. If that State was to give effective aid to the General Government in its struggle with the organized forces of rebellion it could only do so by borrowing money sufficient to meet the emergency, for it had no money in its treasury that had not been specifically appropriated for the expenses of its own government. It could not have borrowed any more than the General Government could have borrowed without stipulating to pay such interest as was customary in the commercial world. Congress did not expect that any State would decline to borrow and await the collection of money raised by taxation before it moved to the support of the nation. It expected that each loyal State would, as did New York, respond at once in furtherance of the avowed purpose of Congress, by whatever force necessary to maintain the rightful authority and existence of the National Government.

"'We can not doubt that the interest paid by the State on its bonds, issued to raise money for the purposes expressed by Congress, constituted a part of the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by it for those objects. Such interest, when paid, became a principal sum as between the State and the United States; that is, became a part of the aggregate sum paid by the State for the United States. The principal and interest so paid constitutes a debt from the United States to the State. It is as if the United States had itself borrowed the money through the agency of the State. We therefore hold that the court below did not err in adjudging that the $91,320.84 paid by the State for interest upon its bonds issued in 1861 to defray the expenses to be incurred in raising troops for the national defense was a principal sum, which the United States agreed to pay, and not interest within the meaning of the rule prohibiting the allowance of interest accruing upon claims against the United States prior to the rendition of judgment thereon.

"'The canal fund was made by the constitution of the State a sinking fund for the ultimate liquidation of what is known as the canal debt of New York. In April and May, 1861, $2,039,663.06 from the taxes of 1860 reached the treasury of the State, and under the constitution and laws of New York that amount should have been invested in securities for the benefit of the canal fund and the interest derived from those securities paid into the fund. The State was permitted to use a part of the above sum under an agreement by its officers that interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent should be paid. It recognized and fulfilled that agreement, and now claims that the interest it so paid to the canal fund constituted a charge or expense properly incurred in raising, subsisting, and supplying troops to suppress the rebellion.

"'We are of opinion that, so far as the question of the liability of the United States is concerned, there is, on principle, no difference between the claim for $91,320.84 and the claim for $39,867.18. We do not stop to inquire whether the action of the canal commissioners in allowing the State to use a part of the moneys collected for the benefit of the canal fund was strictly in accordance with law. Suffice it to say that the canal fund was entitled to any interest earned upon money belonging to it, and fidelity to the constitution and laws of New York required the State to recognize that right in the only way it could at the time have been done, namely, by paying the interest that ought to have been realized by the commissioners of the canal fund if they had invested in interest-paying securities the moneys they permitted the State to use for military purposes.

"'If the canal-fund money used by the State comptroller to defray the expenses of raising and equipping troops had been borrowed upon the bonds of the State sold in open market, the interest paid on such bonds would, for the reasons we have stated, be a just charge against the United States on account of expenses properly incurred by the State for the purposes expressed by Congress. And such would have been the result if the moneys of the canal fund had been invested by the commissioners directly in bonds of the State bearing the same rate of interest that was paid to the commissioners of that fund. The substance of the transaction was that the State, for moneys that could not be legally appropriated for the ordinary expenses of its own Government, and which the law required to be so invested as to earn interest for the canal fund, used those moneys for military purposes, under an agreement by its officers, subsequently ratified by the State, to pay interest thereon. It was, in its essence, a loan to the State by the commissioners of the canal fund of money to be repaid with interest.

"'The obligation of the United States to indemnify the State on account of such payment is quite as great as it would be if the transaction had occurred between the State and some corporation from which it borrowed the money. It is not the case of the State taking money out of one pocket to supply a deficiency in another over which it had full power, for, although the moneys brought into its treasury by the collection of taxes were under its control, the State was without power to manage and control taxes collected for the canal fund, except as provided in its constitution and laws. It could not legally have become a party to any arrangement or agreement involving the use, without interest, of the moneys of the canal fund that had been set apart for the ultimate payment of the canal debt.

"'We are of the opinion that the claim of the State for money paid on account of interest to the commissioners of the canal fund is not one against the United States for interest as such, but is a claim for costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred and paid by the State in aid of the General Government, and is embraced by the act of Congress declaring that the States would be indemnified by the General Government for moneys so expended.

"'As the State was entitled to a larger sum than $91,320.84, the judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded with directions for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.'

"As I understand this decision, it announces the doctrine, in language that can not be misunderstood, that the Government of the United States is under legal obligation to reimburse to the States every dollar that said States properly paid out upon obligations incurred by them for any of the purposes expressed in the reimbursement acts of 1861.

"That interest paid by States in procuring means with which to raise and equip troops is not considered as interest, but as part of the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in raising and equipping of troops.

"That all proper and necessary costs, charges, or expenses incurred by States in raising money for such purposes should on proper demand be reimbursed to said States.

"To put it in the terse language of the decision, 'It is as if the United States had borrowed the money through the agency of the State;' that is, the United States constituted the States its agents to borrow money. It follows that every cent such States were compelled to pay out on account of loans should be reimbursed to them by their principal, the United States, without any deduction or rebate whatsoever.

"The facts of this claim of Indiana, to state them briefly, are:

"It is shown by the report of the auditor for the State of Indiana for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1860, that the State owed—

An interest-bearing debt of	$7,770,273.50
Internal-improvement bonds outstanding	393,000.00
Five per cent State stock outstanding	5,322,500.00
Two and one-half per cent State stock outstanding	2,054,773.50
Total State debt October 31, 1860	7,770,273.50

"It is also shown by this report that the running expenses of the State for said fiscal year were $1,621,107.48.

"That its entire receipts for the same period of time were only $1,658,217.88.

"Leaving a cash balance in the treasury on November 1, 1860, of $134,660.39.

"It is apparent from these facts that there was no money in the treasury of the State of Indiana in 1861 which could have been used to defray the expenses of enlisting, enrolling, arming, equipping, and mustering troops into the service of the United States.

"If Indiana were to raise and equip troops to meet the then existing emergency, she must borrow money. It required ready money to accomplish these things. Considering alone the condition of her finances, and not considering what is a matter of common history, that many of her misguided citizens, especially along the Ohio River, were in almost open rebellion against the Government, it is not strange that her credit was not of a gilt-edge order.

"But the legislature of Indiana, being dominated at the time by the master spirit of her great war governor, Oliver P. Morton, passed an act, which was approved and became a law on the 13th day of May, 1861, authorizing the governor of Indiana, for the purpose of obtaining money for repelling invasion and to provide for the public defense, to issue $2,000,000 of bonds, $200,000 thereof to be in bonds of the denomination of $500 each and the residue of the $2,000,000 in bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, all of said bonds to draw interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st day of May, 1862, the interest falling due between the date of sale and the 1st day of November, 1861, to be payable in advance, said bonds to be payable to bearer twenty years after date, the interest payable on presentation and surrender of coupons as they become due, both bonds and coupons to be payable at the Indiana agency in the city of New York, the bonds to be signed by the governor and countersigned by the auditor, numbered and registered in the office of the auditor and secretary of the State. The form of bond is set out in the act.

"Section 3 of the act authorized the board of sinking fund commissioners of the State to purchase said bonds at par to the extent of any money they might have on hand subject to loan, and the interest when paid on said bonds to be disposed of in the same manner as the interest arising from the ordinary loans to individuals.

"Section 2 of the act made provision for the appointment of a board of loan commissioners, consisting of three persons, who were to be paid $5 per day for each day they were actually engaged in negotiating the loan, together with their actual expenses. It was also provided in said section that said bonds, when ready for sale, should be delivered to said commissioners and sold by them as the wants of the treasury of the State should from time to time demand, and the money arising therefrom, together with all exchange and any premium that might accrue thereon, should be paid by said commissioners into the State treasury. It was also provided in said section that the said board of loan commissioners should, as therein provided, on the first days of August, November, February, and May of each year, file with the auditor of the State a report containing the number and denomination of bonds sold and the price received therefor and the time when sold.

"Section 5 of said act made provision for an annual tax of 5 cents on each $100 in value of the taxable property of the State with which to provide a fund for the payment of the interest on said bonds, and to provide a sinking fund with which to pay the principal of said bonds when they should mature. That the excess of said taxes collected after paying the accruing interest on said bonds should be put into the sinking fund, with authority to the sinking-fund commissioners to purchase any of said bonds if they could be procured on reasonable terms, and if not, then to invest the same in other Indiana securities, said commission to keep a record of the number and amount and price paid for such bonds, from whom and when purchased. For the final payment of said bonds, with interest thereon, the faith of the State was irrevocably pledged.

"Section 9 of said act declared that because the ordinary revenues of the State were insufficient to meet the necessary expenses growing out of the then insurrectionary acts of certain States, an emergency existed for the passage of such act, and that it would be in force from and after its passage.

"That in pursuance of the said act of the legislature Jesse J. Brown, J. H. Boyle, and James M. Ray were appointed as members of the board of loan commissioners.

"That from time to time, commencing the 28th day of May, 1861, and extending to and including the 14th day of August, 1862, the said loan commissioners negotiated and sold all of said bonds; that none of said bonds sold at a premium; that said bonds sold all the way from 5 to 17 per cent discount; that of said bonds the sum of $125,000 were sold on May 28, 1861, to the commissioners of the sinking fund of Indiana at par; that the further sum of $108,500 of said bonds were sold on the 14th day of August, 1862, to the State debt sinking fund at a discount of 5 per cent; that said sum of $125,000 par value of said bonds so sold to the commissioners of the sinking fund at par were redeemed by the State on the 20th day of January, 1867, and the accrued interest thereon at that time and paid by the said State amounted to $42,437.50.

"These bonds so sold to the commissioners of the sinking fund, and upon which the above amount of interest was paid, was a borrowing of funds by the State from one of its trust funds, set apart by the constitution and laws of the State of Indiana and not subject to the control of the legislature of the State of Indiana, nor subject to be used by the State to defray its current expenses or to the payment of the principal or interest on said war bonds.

"That the said $108,500 par value of bonds sold to the State debt sinking fund on August 14, 1862, at 5 per cent discount, was on the same day redeemed by the State at the same rate of discount for which they were sold.

"These two transactions represent all the transactions had with the State's sinking funds relative to sales of these bonds.

"The remainder of said issue of $2,000,000 was sold to individuals and corporations at discounts varying from 5 to 17 per cent.

"The State suffered an apparent discount on account of the sale of said bonds in the sum of $243,603.40. This was only an apparent discount, however. The facts show that the State received on account of the sinking fund and other purchasers of bonds, allowing the State to redeem bonds sold at a discount at the same price for which they were sold, the sum of $91,756.50; net discount, $151,846.90.

"The State paid on account of salaries and expenses of negotiating the sale of said bonds by said bond-sale commissioners the sum of $1,633.89.

"The State paid on account of printing, commissions, and expenses made necessary on account of said bond issue the sum of $421.46.

"The State paid on account of exchange in paying the semiannual interest on said bonds in the city of New York the sum of $609.54.

"The State paid out in semiannual interest on said bonds up to and including the 1st day of May, 1868, the sum of $367,154.98.

"The State received on account of rebate of interest due on bonds when sold the sum of $6,982.75.

"Deducting this latter amount from the sum of the above five amounts, showing the items in favor of the State, leaves the sum of $514,684.02, being the sum of the amounts going to make up the correct amount of the discounts, charges, expenses, and interest paid and suffered by the State of Indiana on account of the sale of said bonds up to and including the 1st day of May, 1868.

"If the United States had taken care of the principal and interest of these bonds and paid them at maturity, as she might have done, and which would have been entirely proper for the principal to have done for her agent, it would have been the duty of the State of Indiana to have accounted to the Government of the United States for whatever sum it may have received on account of the sale of said bonds, and the duty of the Government of the United States to have reimbursed it for any and all legitimate expenses it was put to in making the sales. The question of discount and interest would not have entered into the account.

"But the Government left the State of Indiana to take care of and pay said bonds, principal and interest, under the terms of its contract as made and set out in said bonds and on the best terms it could get from the bondholders, agreeing to reimburse it for all costs, charges, and expenses growing out of and connected with the sale of said bonds, provided it used the money obtained from their sale for the raising, arming, and equipping of its troops for the war of the rebellion.

"The facts in the case clearly show that during the year 1861 the State of Indiana used all the money it derived from the sale of these bonds, and a much larger amount, some of which was advanced to the State by the Government in the way of scrip, which it discounted, and other moneys which it borrowed, through the heroic efforts of Governor Morton, from other sources, in arming, equipping, and putting in the field its soldiers. All of said money realized on account of said bond sale was used during the years 1861-1862 for the purpose aforesaid. The facts also clearly show, without going into details which would unduly extend this decision, that the State anticipated the payment of these bonds and paid them when it had moneys which could be expended for that purpose, and when the bondholders would accept payment before the bonds were due under their terms. If the whole bond issue had run until it was due under the terms of the bonds, as it might have done, the interest at 6 per cent, the rate thereon, on these bonds would have amounted at their maturity to $2,400,000.

"It seems perfectly clear to me that to reimburse the State of Indiana on account of its expenditures because of this bond sale it will be necessary for the United States to repay to it every dollar it legitimately expended on account of principal and interest, together with all expenses in the negotiation of their sale. The State became liable for and paid the principal of these bonds, as well as the interest, as it accrued. Therefore, to reimburse it we must repay all such sums, the State losing the interest on such payments from the time it made them, for the reason that the United States in the absence of a special contract does not pay interest.

"The above, relative to interest paid by the State on said bonds, is not the view of the Court of Claims, as seemingly announced by it in the State of Maine v. United States (36 C. Cls. R., 531).

"In that case the State of Maine, to arm and equip its troops for the war of the rebellion, issued bonds and sold them at par and paid them, principal and interest. It showed that it used a portion of the proceeds of said bond sale to arm and equip its troops.

"The Court of Claims, on its claim for reimbursement on account of this bond issue, did not allow it the amount of interest paid on the amount of bonds sold and the proceeds of which it used in arming and equipping its troops, but stated the account, as will appear by Exhibit A accompanying this decision.

"It seems to me that it is perfectly apparent that the method adopted by the Court of Claims in the settlement of that account did not follow or apply the principles of reimbursement as announced in the New York case. It did not in any sense of the word reimburse the State of Maine on account of interest paid by it on the bonds which it sold and the proceeds of which it used in raising and equipping its troops. The case was settled on the basis that when the Government made a payment to Maine that this payment was to be deducted from the amount of bonds which it had sold and the proceeds of which it used in arming and equipping its troops, and stopped the interest on the amount paid by the Government at the date of such payment.

"If these payments had been made to the bondholders and had been applied by them to the principal of the bonds, the theory adopted by the Court of Claims would have been correct; but these payments were not made to the bondholders and did not stop the interest on the bonds which the State of Maine was compelled to pay. The payments to Maine by the United States were necessarily made on the principal of these bonds, or rather they were made to reimburse Maine for the moneys it used in arming, equipping, and supplying its troops. This money was procured from the sale of the bonds. The moment the State of Maine incurred an expense in arming and equipping her troops and furnished proper vouchers to show said facts, it was the duty of the United States to reimburse it for such expenses regardless of where or how she got the money.

"Stopping the interest accruing on bonds which neither the State nor the United States could have paid without the consent of the bondholder at the time a partial payment was made to the State necessarily to reimburse it for moneys which it had actually expended and which it was obligated to repay to its bonded creditors, strikes me as a most remarkable proposition, no more remarkable, however, than unjust. It is for a principal to say to his agent, 'You have incurred a debt on my account, and by my authority, and for my benefit, which will continue to draw interest for years, and which you are obliged to pay, principal and interest, out of your own means; you used the principal sum, it is true, for which the obligation is given, upon which you will be compelled to pay the stipulated interest for years, and the principal when due, for my benefit, but I will repay you in full the principal sum which you and not I will have to pay at maturity, and thereby I will release myself from all further obligation on account of the obligations you incurred for my use and benefit. It is true you will have to pay both principal and interest out of your own means, the principal when due under the terms of your obligation, and the interest half yearly from the date of the obligation to its maturity, yet, because I now repay you the principal, I am released from reimbursing you for the interest hereafter paid by you.'

"The above is just what the Court of Claims, by its calculation, or, rather, method of calculation, did to the State of Maine in the case supra.

"While I exceedingly dislike to disagree with a court of the eminence of the Court of Claims, or any other court, yet I can not bring my conscience up to the point of deliberately wronging the State of Indiana, or any other State, by adopting a method of calculation which does not reimburse or make whole these States on account of the expenses paid by them which the Supreme Court says shall and ought to be reimbursed to them.

"I am convinced that the Court of Claims was led into what I believe was an error and one which worked a great wrong to the State of Maine by adopting the calculation of an accountant, who no doubt is a good accountant, whose figures are no doubt correct, but who certainly has not shown himself possessed of either a legal or an equitable mind.

"Believing, as I do, that in order to reimburse the State of Indiana the Government must repay to it all interest which it was compelled to pay on account of this bond issue, I therefore certify a difference of $514,684.02 as a legal claim from the audit hereinbefore set out and reopened, to be paid when Congress shall make an appropriation therefor.

"Regarding the appeal from the Auditor, I find that since the 1st day of May, 1868, the State paid and was compelled to pay as interest on the bonds that were outstanding at that date the sum of $121,175.18.

"That the State had paid and taken up these bonds as rapidly as it had the money with which to redeem them, as raised by taxation or otherwise procured, as soon as the holders thereof would allow them to be redeemed under the terms of said contract. That all of said bonds were redeemed within twenty years from the date of their issue.

"I therefore certify a difference in such appeal of $121,175.18 as a legal claim to be reported to Congress for an appropriation.

"R. J. TRACEWELL, Comptroller."

The amount found due the State of Indiana by the Comptroller was certified by the Auditor for an appropriation, and to the certificate was added:

"This ($635,859.20) is the amount found due and allowed by the Comptroller of the Treasury under his decision of April 14, 1902.

"If this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor for the War Department in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Indiana from the United States on this claim:

For interest and expenses	$135,169.05
For discount	151,846.90
Making a total of	287,015.95

"Instead of the amount certified."

The claim of the State of Iowa never having been settled was taken up by the Auditor for original consideration, and under the decision of the Comptroller of April 14, 1902, in the Indiana case, a balance of $456,417.89 was allowed and certified for an appropriation April 29, 1902. To this certificate was added:

"This allowance is based upon the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury dated April 14, 1902.

"If this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor for the War Department in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Iowa from the United States on this claim $229,639.62 instead of the amount certified."

The claims of the States of Michigan, Ohio, and Illinois of like character, which had been in whole or part disallowed by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, have been reopened and settled by the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the balances have been certified by this office, as follows:

In the claim of the State of Michigan there was certified for payment to the State under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury $332,167.62 for discount and interest from 1861 to 1870, and to this certificate was added:

"If this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor for the War Department in the settlement of the claims of the States of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Michigan—

For interest and expenses	$130,725.26
For discount	32,644.77
Making a total of	163,370.13

"Instead of the amount certified."

In the claim of the State of Ohio there was allowed by the Comptroller $458,559.35 for expenses and interest on loans from 1861 to 1871, and to the certificate was added this statement:

"The Comptroller further states that had this claim been settled by him, applying the principles of the decision of the Court of Claims in the case of the State of Maine (36 C. Cls., 531), he would have found due the State of Ohio the sum of $443,145.24 instead of the amount above certified."

In the claim of the State of Illinois there was certified under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury $1,005,129.29 for discount and interest on loans from 1861 to 1880. Of this amount, $774,560.28 was allowed by the Comptroller for expenses and interest to July 1, 1867, and $230,569.01 was allowed by the Auditor for interest from July 1, 1867, to January 1, 1880. To the certificate in this case was added the statement:

"That if this claim had been settled in accordance with the principles announced by the Court of Claims and followed by the Auditor for the War Department in the settlement of the claims of Maine, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, already allowed and paid under the findings of that court, there would be due the State of Illinois—

For interest and expenses	$202,491.81
For discount	232,605.00

instead of the amount certified."

The claims of the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Kansas, Vermont, and Wisconsin are still before the Court of Claims, pending a finding of the law and facts by that court. Upon their return to this office the findings of the Court of Claims in these cases will be subject to a restatement and settlement in accordance with the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury of April 14, 1902, in the claim of Indiana and his subsequent decisions in the cases of Michigan, Ohio, and Illinois.

Respectfully, F. E. RITTMAN, Auditor.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CURRIER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2295, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 200. Joint resolution amending "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902;

H. R. 4636. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails; and

H. R. 15004. An act to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnepeg Railway Company, of Minnesota, to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WACHTER also, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had presented this day to the President of the United States for his approval bills of the following titles:

H. R. 13150. An act granting a pension to James B. Mahan; and

H. R. 10299. An act authorizing the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company to sell or lease its railroad property and franchises, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence of Mr. HEATWOLE was extended until Tuesday.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WOOTEN obtained unanimous consent to print remarks in the RECORD on House bill 14947.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the order previously made, this House will stand in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Mr. CURRIER as Speaker pro tempore at 8 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In pursuance of the order previously made, the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Senate bill 2295.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. GAINES of West Virginia in the chair.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Senate bill 2295.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do we open up on this side?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Whatever may be the pleasure of the gentleman. We are prepared to proceed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think we will proceed. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, negotiations for peace between the United States and Spain resulted in a treaty by which Spain ceded to the United States the Philippine Archipelago with all her rights of sovereignty and property. That treaty, negotiated by the executive branch of the Government, was ratified by the Senate, and the title thus obtained has been declared valid and perfect by the judicial branch. Therefore the legal title of the United States is complete. With the wisdom of this acquisition of territory we are not concerned at this time. That question was settled by the treaty-making power when the treaty was concluded and ratified.

If the wisdom of this acquisition were an open question it might be truthfully urged that from the beginning no step was taken that did not seem to be necessary and inevitable. No step was taken against the approval of a great majority of the people. Democrats and Republicans stood together in declaring war against Spain, in bringing it to a successful conclusion on land and sea, in negotiating and ratifying the treaty of peace which conferred the title and sovereignty of Spain in the Philippine Archipelago, in suppressing insurrection against the authority of the United States, in undertaking to establish a government in place of that destroyed by war.

The voice of the partisan was not heard in opposition to any of these movements until the campaign of 1900, when the issue was made upon the retention of the Philippines, but the people put the seal of their approval upon all that had been done or proposed by the reelection, by a great majority, of the great and good President who had been chiefly instrumental in taking over the sovereignty of the Philippines. If a mistake was made it was a mistake of practically the whole people and whether wise or unwise the people do not mean to repudiate their own action.

The beneficent purpose of the United States in acquiring title to the islands was expressed by President McKinley. He said:

> No imperial design lurks in the American mind. That would be alien to American sentiment, thought, and purpose. Our priceless principles undergo no change under a tropical sun. If we can benefit these people, who will object? If in years they are established in government under law and liberty, who will regret our perils and sacrifices; who will not rejoice in our heroism and humanity? I have no light or knowledge not common to my countrymen. I do not prophesy. The present is all-absorbing to me; but I can not bound my vision by the blood-stained trenches around Manila, where every red drop, whether from the veins of an American soldier or a misguided Filipino, is anguish to my heart, but by the broad range of future years, when the group of islands under the impulse of the year just passed shall have become the gems and glories of these tropical seas, a land of plenty and of increasing possibilities, a people redeemed from savage indolence and habits, devoted to the arts of peace, in touch with the commerce and trade of all nations, enjoying the blessings of freedom, of civil and religious liberty, of education, and of homes, and whose children and children's children shall for ages hence bless the American Republic because it emancipated and redeemed their fatherland and set them in the pathway of the world's civilization.
> The treaty now commits the free and unfranchised Filipinos to the guiding and liberalizing influence, the generous sympathies, the uplifting education, not of their American masters, but of their American emancipators.

The right of the United States to establish and maintain a government, military or civil, in the Philippine Archipelago in the place of that destroyed by war, results from their acquisition and can not be questioned. The governments now maintained were instituted in the exercise of an undoubted belligerent right and in the discharge of a national obligation imposed by international law. By virtue of conquest, purchase, and occupancy, and in obedience to the duty of maintaining the security of the inhabitants in their persons and property, the provisional governments have been organized. In the case of New Orleans v. Steamship Company, 20 Wallace, 394, the Supreme Court held:

> In such cases the conquering power has the right to displace the preexisting authority and to assume to such an extent as it may deem proper the exercise by itself of all the powers and functions of government. It may appoint all the necessary officers and clothe them with designated powers, larger or smaller, according to its pleasure. It may prescribe the revenues to be paid and apply them to its own use or otherwise. It may do anything necessary to strengthen itself and weaken the enemy. There is no limit to the powers that may be exercised in such cases, save those which are found in the laws and usages of war.

In United States, Lyon et al. v. Huckabee (16 Wallace, 414–434) the court say:

> Power to acquire territory either by conquest or treaty is vested by the Constitution in the United States. Conquered territory, however, is usually held as a mere military occupation until the fate of the nation from which it is conquered is determined, but if the nation is entirely subdued, or in case it is destroyed and ceases to exist, the right of occupation becomes permanent and the title rests absolutely in the conqueror. Complete conquest, by whatever mode it may be perfected, carries with it all the rights of the former government, or, in other words, the conqueror, by the completion of his conquest, becomes the absolute owner of the property conquered from the enemy nation or State. His rights are no longer limited to the mere occupation of what he has taken into his actual possession, but they extend to all the property and rights of the conquered State, including even debts as well as personal property.

The right and the duty of the United States being clear, the question now to be decided is whether the proposed bill for the government of the Philippine Islands is a just and wise measure, within the lawful power of Congress, necessary for perfecting and ratifying the forms of government already in existence, and conducive to the good order and protection of life and property. The obligation to maintain the security of the inhabitants of these islands is cast upon the United States by the law of nations, they being the property of the United States by purchase, conquest, and occupancy.

The first step taken toward establishing a government in this our newly acquired territory was to send a commission of distinguished and able men, headed by Professor Schurman, to examine and report upon the condition and needs of the Philippine Islands. The next was to appoint a governing commission, at the head of which a distinguished jurist, Hon. William Taft, was placed. This Commission has enacted a code of laws, organized and put into operation governments in 37 provinces and 800 municipalities, and made substantial progress toward providing satisfactory conditions for the people.

If no unexpected obstacle had been encountered, it is reasonable to suppose that in a few years the substantial control of the islands might with propriety and safety have been turned over to the people, and the same measure of freedom might have been enjoyed by them that the people of other territorial possessions of the United States are now enjoying. Surely it is to be regretted that anything has occurred to mar the prospect of an early solution of the Philippine trouble, or to defer the benefits which just and equal laws would confer upon them. But obstacles were encountered. First, an ill advised and hopeless insurrection against the authority of the United States was instituted by certain revolutionary leaders, which was encouraged by theorists and dreamers as well as violent partisans here. As to the necessity for crushing this insurrection, there was and is no substantial difference of opinion. The task has practically been accomplished, the leaders captured, and the insurgents dispersed. Unfortunately it has not been without serious cost of blood and treasure, or without the unavoidable calamities and cruelties of war.

Just as the time seemed to be drawing near when an end of serious trouble might be expected an attack was organized in this country upon the men and officers of the Army of the United States well calculated to prolong resistance to our authority in the Philippines and postpone the successful introduction of a free government by the people. The "malevolent misrepresentations" upon which the attack proceeds negative any conclusion that its authors regard the interests of the people of the islands. To accomplish their purpose they have not hesitated to assail the President, Secretary of War, the Republican Senators, the officers and men of the Army with accusations which, if true, would condemn them to the contempt and hatred of all honorable men. Listen to some of the charges:

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RHEA] said in this House:

But nearly four years have passed and the bloody tragedy still goes on, and as the years have fled the Army has been enormously augmented; the expenditures are climbing rapidly to the half-billion mark; our military excesses have gone from bad to worse, until the country has been largely depopulated of its adult male citizenship, to say nothing of the women and children who have perished in the awful work of destruction.

In another body this charge was made:

Mr. President, history records many instances of cruelty and barbarity practiced in warfare. We shudder at the atrocious acts of the Huns when they overran ancient Rome, and the name of Attila, their leader, has become the synonym for all that is ferocious and bloodthirsty. He is known to history as the Scourge of God. But the Huns were barbarians, and they practiced that to which they were accustomed. The world stands appalled at the record of cruelties practiced by the Duke of Alva in the Low Countries; but Alva fought in the name of religion, and religious zeal when aroused to the point of war has ever been merciless. Even liberty, when pushed to the wall, has had its votaries of blood. The French Revolution shook the world with its struggle and paralyzed mankind with its ferocity, and it left behind, to be added to the bloody roll of human scourges, the names of Robespierre, Marat, and Danton.

But it remained for an American soldier, in the twentieth century, representing the highest type of civilization, in a quarrel having not a single element of religious strife, having for its professed object the accomplishment of benevolent and philanthropic purposes, to raise his name to a preeminence of bloody infamy which places it above the names of any of the scourges of humanity to whom I have referred. This monster in human form, in cold blood, devoted an entire province to extermination; the males over the age of 10 years to slaughter, the females and younger children to the no less certain but the less merciful fate of starvation, because, bereft of their protectors, bereft of their homes, wandering with their young through a howling wilderness, what other fate than slow starvation was left for these stricken creatures and their unfortunate offspring?

In the same body this charge was made:

I mean that, so far as the Senator from Massachusetts is concerned, the whole tenor of his speech was a labored piece of special pleading to excuse—I probably used too strong a word when I said justified—I should not have said that, but the whole tenor of his argument was a labored piece of special pleading to find excuse and palliation for the bloody and infamous and inhuman orders of General Smith. The Senator himself suggests that there may be mitigating circumstances for the issuance of a wholesale death warrant against a whole people without stopping to make any discrimination whatever between friend and foe.

The Senator says there may be extenuating circumstances. Mr. President, there can be no extenuating circumstances. The Senator from Massachusetts in the whole course of his speech not only was unable to suggest a single circumstance that mitigated or extenuated in the least degree this inhuman order, but he failed to suggest a single reason why this man Smith ought not to be hanged as a common murderer. He is not quite as bad as Nero was. That is the plea of the Senator from Massachusetts. He has not yet dipped men in pitch and lifted them up on poles to be burned alive. Smith has not done that. That is the defense of the Senator from Massachusetts. He has not lit the tar candles yet. He has done nothing but butcher in cold blood a whole people, including little children, leaving the women and the babes at the breast to starve to death in the land which he had made a howling wilderness.

That is the only defense the champions of Butcher Smith have been able to make on the floor of the United States Senate, and a man who says anything against Smith is dishonoring the American Army. Why do you not say that he is attacking the whole Smith family? Smith is not the American Army; Bell is not the American Army; Chaffee is not the American Army, neither is Root the American Army. So far as I am concerned, I do not intend to be deterred by any slanderous imputation upon the motive of Democratic Senators from expressing my opinion of any of the brutal and inhuman wretches who have been perpetrating these atrocities in the Philippine Islands.

Poor old scoundrel! Poor old murderer! Poor old butcher! I am proud to say, Mr. President, that up to this time the only man on the floor of the Senate who has been shameless enough to defend that bloody scoundrel has been the junior Senator from Iowa.

* * * * * * * *

No, Mr. President, the facts alleged by Senators when they tell of the terrible hatred, the terrible cruelty which the Filipinos have exercised, and the remorseless retaliations, as they choose to describe them, which have been perpetrated upon them, although we have slaughtered people and tortured people who have committed no wrong, show that we are entering upon a task that means a century, perhaps three centuries, of constant bloodshed, of war, and of insurrection, that means the shedding of God only knows how much American and Filipino blood and of how much treasure to be wrung from the American people, and all, as I have said before, for no other purpose except that a few carpetbag thieves may have unlimited license to plunder the people of the Philippine Islands. That is what we are asked to do. We are asked to assume all that burden, we are asked to foot the bill, we are asked to tolerate murder and massacre and torture for no other purpose except that a few carpetbaggers may have the opportunity to rob the people of the Philippines as they used to rob the people of the Southern States.

In the same body this charge was made:

Oh, my God! that is the logic upon which Chaffee based the brutal orders and instructions which he issued to his subordinate commanders. Did Chaffee, alone, unaided, in coldness, and in brutality and in savage and unrelenting disregard of every humane sentiment or possibility of human suffering, conceive this iniquitous scheme? Whence, from what diabolical source, was it derived? The American people ought to know. Is there any penalty beneath the sun adequate to be meted out to the merciless wretch who has thus brought such dishonor upon the American name and the American people?

These charges are put forth by men who are or who hope to be leaders of the minority. I am well aware that in this Chamber there is a disposition to excuse and palliate and deny that these accusations were meant to defame and degrade the Army. Perhaps their indignant repudiation by the press and people have not failed of effect, but it is as useless to attempt to disguise the malice that prompted them as it is to now attempt to palliate or excuse.

If these accusations were true, the President, Senators, Cabinet, and Congressmen who are responsible for the policy in the Philippines, as well as the officers and soldiers of the Army, would not be fit to live in any Christian country. They would be entitled to the condemnation and contempt of all civilized men. That they are false in general and particular is well known to all, including the men who make them. A complete answer is found in the official utterance of the Secretary of War and in the evidence of many credible witnesses.

The war on the part of the Filipinos has been conducted with the barbarous cruelty common among uncivilized races and with general disregard of the rules of civilized warfare. They deliberately adopted the policy of killing all natives, however peaceful, who were friendly to our Government, and in literally thousands of instances these poor creatures, dependent upon our soldiers for protection, have been assassinated.

The Filipino troops have frequently fired upon our men from under protection of flags of truce, tortured to death American prisoners who have fallen into their hands, buried alive both Americans and friendly natives, and horribly mutilated the bodies of the American dead. That the soldiers fighting against such an enemy and with their own eyes witnessing such deeds should occasionally be regardless of their orders and retaliate by unjustifiable severities is not incredible. Such things happen in every war, even between two civilized nations, and they always will happen while war lasts. That such occurrences have been sanctioned or permitted is not true. A constant and effective pressure of prohibition, precept, and discipline has been maintained against them. That there has been any such practice is not true. * * * The war in the Philippines has been conducted by the American Army with scrupulous regard for the rules of civilized warfare, with careful and genuine consideration for the prisoner and the noncombatant, with self-restraint, and with humanity never surpassed, if ever equaled, in any conflict, worthy only of praise, and reflecting credit upon the American people.

Also in the testimony of General MacArthur:

I doubt if any war, international or civil, any war on earth, has been conducted with as much humanity, with as much careful consideration, with as much self-restraint, in view of the character of our adversaries, as have been the American operations in the Philippine Archipelago.

I desire to say that it is my deliberate judgment that there never was a war conducted, whether against inferior races or not, in which there was more compassion, and more restraint, and more generosity, assuming that there was a war at all, than there has been in the Philippine Islands.

Individual men have committed individual outrages, but when we compare the conditions that exist in the Philippines to-day in that respect with what have existed in all modern wars between civilized states, the comparison is absolutely in favor of the self-restraint and high discipline of the American soldier. The bearing of our Army as a whole was simply superb.

Also in the testimony of General Hughes:

I have no hesitation in saying that so far as I know the same consideration was shown the Filipino when he was captured or wounded that was given to our own people when captured or wounded in the civil war.

Also in the testimony of General Otis in answer to the following question:

Now, will you tell the committee what the fact is about the cruelty toward the native prisoners or otherwise of the American officers and soldiers, as to whether cruelty by American officers and soldiers was practiced upon the people or even upon prisoners, or whether, on the contrary, kindness and consideration was practiced by our troops toward them?

General OTIS. The greatest kindness. We were laughed at by the Spaniards and by Europeans for the humanity we exercised.

Also in the report of Professor Schurman's Commission:

We are aware that there are those who have seen fit to accuse our troops of desecrating churches, murdering prisoners, and committing unmentionable crimes. To those who derive satisfaction from seizing on isolated occurrences, regrettable indeed, but incident to every war, and making them the basis of sweeping accusations, this Commission has nothing to say. Still less do we feel called upon to answer the idle tales without foundation in fact. But for the satisfaction of those who have found it difficult to understand why the transporting of American citizens across the Pacific Ocean should change their nature, we are glad to express the belief that a war was never more humanely conducted. Insurgents' wounded were repeatedly succored on the field by our men at the risk of their lives.

The testimony of these honored and distinguished men ought to be sufficient to hush the lying tongue of slander, but it is not. So eager are the slanderers that they seize upon isolated instances of so-called cruelty perpetrated by individuals and magnify them into a cause for a wholesale condemnation of the whole body of American troops and of all the Government officials who are in any way responsible for the army in the Philippines. It would be as just to condemn any Christian community in which a murder is committed as being a community peopled only by murderers.

What can be the motive prompting these false and slanderous accusers? Why has this "campaign of vituperation" been opened? Considering the quarter from whence it comes and the character of the accusers the only answer possible is that it is animated by a desire to secure a petty partisan advantage. The authors hope to bring the Republican leaders and Administration into contempt and under condemnation by the people. They hope to install themselves in places of power. To accomplish this purpose they are willing to forget patriotism, their country's glory, and the just pride of Anglo-Saxon men. They shout base and unfounded charges against the soldiers of the Republic who have done duty under a burning tropical sun, forcing their way through jungles and swamps and wildernesses, beset by a lurking and savage foe, surrounded by treachery, shot from ambush, encompassed by an enemy bound by no rule of civilized warfare, who torture, mutilate, and burn prisoners of war.

They denounce the battle-scarred officers of our Army as butchers and murderers, the Government of their country as being engaged in the slaughter of innocent people for the purpose of giving thieves and scoundrels a chance to rob the inhabitants of and to plunder the Philippine Islands, and they do it to gain a partisan advantage. May God forgive them; surely they know not the mischief they are doing. They take no account and make no mention of the intolerable conditions and unbearable provocations suffered by our men. They make no mention of such cases as that of Private O'Hearn, who was captured by apparently friendly Filipinos, tied to a tree, burned four hours with a slow fire, and then slashed into pieces with bolos, or to the five native scouts who, with one soldier of the Fifth Infantry, were taken prisoners off Batac January 1, and who were found east of that place with heads, legs, and arms cut off and otherwise horribly mutilated. The soldier of the Fifth Infantry, after being taken, was cut with bolos and left on the field for dead. He revived and was able to crawl to a shack when night came on. Information was given a local leader, and he was again taken prisoner and murdered.

Or of the case of the American sailor, as reported in the record of a court-martial:

With respect to the first specification, it is made plain by the testimony that after the fight had by Lieutenant Gilmore, of the Navy, near Baler, four American sailors lay on the bank of the Sabali River, and that the accused and a detachment of insurgent soldiers were detailed as a burial party. This party, accompanied by one Quicoy, a staff officer of the insurgent chief who commanded the district wherein Baler is situated and the forces serving therein, proceeded to where the Americans lay and found two dead and two wounded. Four unarmed natives had been compelled to go along to act as gravediggers, and these were put to work preparing a grave sufficiently large to hold four bodies. The grave being completed, the two dead sailors were placed in it, and the party then waited for the wounded to die.

One of the latter was shot through the thigh; the other was shot in the chest as well as in the leg, and was near the point of death. The wounded men asked for water and it was given them from the river; but beyond this no relief or assistance appears to have been given. When the third man died he was placed beside the other two in the grave and the party again waited for the fourth man to die. His wound, however, was of a kind not necessarily fatal and death was slow in coming, so that the party became impatient. The gravediggers had begun about 9 a. m. and it was now past noon. The dying man asked for water, and was able to drink when it was given to him. Shortly afterwards he was placed in the grave beside his three comrades, and the native who was standing in the hole began covering him slowly from the feet, so as to give him time to die. In this way the body was covered to the neck, and then the gravedigger called out, "What about this man? he is alive yet," to which the accused replied, "Go on burying him," and it was done.

Or of the case of Midshipman Noah, reported by a correspondent of Collier's Magazine:

One more incident of the many that came under my observation and reconciled me to the character of the war we are waging in Samar. A little midshipman just out from Annapolis was patrolling the strait in a yawl from the flagship New York. He was after the smugglers who bring arms to the insurgents from Leyte. The great gale had blown the yawl out into the Pacific, and when it subsided little Noah and his six men were exhausted. Their water had given out, and they tried to make Basay, Admiral Rogers having ordered them not to land except at an armed post. The wind died away while Basay was still 2 miles off.

Two of his men were delirious with thirst, and there was the little village of Nipa Nipa only a few hundred yards away flying the white flag of peace and friendship. Noah, as he floated near the shore, lifted up his empty water jar, and the kindly people on the beach understood. They lifted up water jars overflowing with the precious fluid and pointed at the white flag to reassure him. He pushed his boat into the surf, and, telling his men to wait in the boat, advanced some 50 yards up the beach, where the good Samaritans were awaiting him with their water jars. As he drank his first deep draught two of the natives, one a woman, crept behind him and buried their knives in his back.

He was a native of Chattanooga, Tenn. He lies buried under the sands at Nipa Nipa. His kindred will, no doubt, read with pride and satisfaction the denunciation of the American soldiers and the eulogies of the Philippine banditti uttered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Or of the case of Juan Salvador, a sailor:

In the foregoing case it appears that these accused, Dionicio de la Cruz and Pio de Castro, about May 11, 1901, at barrio Gatboca, Calumpit, siezed, bound, and conveyed to the fields one Juan Salvador, a native sailor of the U. S. gunboat Charleston. There, while the victim was held by De la Cruz, he was stabbed repeatedly in the stomach and abdomen by De Castro, who literally obeyed De la Cruz's order to "cut out the intestines of deceased."

These are only samples of hundreds of such cases.

Is it wonderful that such abominable outrages against humanity and the laws of civilized warfare should be met with retaliation? Ought we to require a higher morality or more humane conduct from our soldiers in the Philippines than is practiced in this country in times of peace?

The consequences of this unparalleled and outrageous assault must have been foreseen and therefore intended. It tends to disgrace the officers and men of the Army in the eyes of all people and degrade them in the estimation of the world. Do the assailants of the Army who deliver their attack from the safe seclusion of legislative halls hate the boys in blue? The time is within the memory of some of us when at least some of them did. Are these attacks made out of sympathy for the Filipinos and a desire to better their condition? If so, they must be prompted by tender and sympathizing hearts. But the bitterest assaults come from men who declare that "to keep this Government a white man's government" they are willing to break and defy every law of God and man; that to accomplish this purpose they have bulldozed, intimidated, hung, shot, burned, and mutilated men a few shades darker than the Filipino, and intend to do it again if necessary to accomplish their purpose. They proclaim their intention to trample and rend the Constitution, if need be, to have their way. In the words of the admirable Plunkett—

They stickle for the letter of the Constitution with the affectation of a prude, but abandon its principles with the effrontery of a prostitute.

Surely hearts that overflow with sympathy for the brown men of the Philippines, and that so yearn for the independence of the heathen people of the islands of the seas ought not to be void of a single spark of pity for the black man of the South. Surely their motive is not sympathy with or a yearning for liberty for the Filipino.

The American people will never approve the defamation or degradation of the Army, or honor its defamers. They believe the American officers and soldiers to be as brave, generous, and humane as any soldiers that ever buckled sword. They do not believe they are all angels or all devils. They know that if acts have been committed which are not permitted by the rules of civilized warfare, the provocation has been great, perhaps beyond the capacity of human nature to endure. The campaign of abuse will fail, from it no harvest of partisan advantage will be gathered, but upon the heads of those who sought success by such means will be visited a judgment of condemnation and disgrace.

Whatever may be finally done with the Philippine Archipelago, it may be assumed that there are some things that will not be done. The United States will never agree to give up the Philippines to their Spanish tormentors, or leave them to be wrangled for by other nations, or surrender friendly Filipinos who have assisted us and by many acts manifested their friendship and their desire to recognize our Government, to be plundered and murdered. They have been shot and burned by the thousand by the insurgents for no other offense than friendship for the United States in the past. What treatment would they be likely to receive in the future? Can we afford to abandon to certain pillage, robbery, and murder those who have been guilty of no crime save that of friendship for our soldiers and Government?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Have you any knowledge of any lynching that ever took place at the command of the civil authorities?

Mr. PALMER. No; nor I never knew of a murder committed by the order of officers of the Army.

Mr. SIMS. What about General Smith's order?

Mr. PALMER. It was entirely within General Orders, No. 100. That order is entirely within the rules of civilized warfare, adopted by the United States during the civil war, and later adopted by nearly every civilized power in the world.

Mr. SIMS. Why not, if this be true, commend rather than condemn him?

Mr. PALMER. Do you condemn him before the court-martial convicts him?

Mr. SIMS. Why do you not commend him, if he carries out the orders of war?

Mr. PALMER. I am willing to await the determination of the court-martial. So far as I can see, he was entirely within the rules of civilized warfare, as laid down by order No. 100, issued by this Government during the civil war and afterwards adopted by practically all the nations.

Mr. SIMS. Do you say there are orders or regulations of war which command or permit the killing of children 10 years of age?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; if the children 10 years of age are as effective as boys of 15 years, and are engaged in actual warfare and actually taking part in the assassination of soldiers. I do not see any difference between boys 10 years old and those who are older.

Mr. SIMS. I am asking if you know of orders or regulations of this country that will permit or require the killing of children 10 years old, all of them, without any discrimination as to whether they are engaged in warfare or not?

Mr. PALMER. If capable of fighting, or if they are taken with arms in their hands, they should be treated exactly in the way that they were. Orders as bad were issued during the civil war by General Frémont.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman in all kindness if he thinks that is right and does he indorse it?

Mr. PALMER. I say whatever the finding of the court-martial is it will satisfy me. Will it satisfy you?

Mr. SIMS. Not if he has been guilty of what has been represented.

Mr. PALMER. Who is to decide?

Mr. SIMS. Smith admits it.

Mr. PALMER. If the properly constituted tribunal finds him not guilty, will you be satisfied?

Mr. SIMS. If he admits the facts, I do not think he could be found not guilty.

Mr. PALMER. You assume that you, 10,000 miles away, are better able to determine the guilt than the officers who constitute the court-martial?

Mr. SIMS. If he admits that he gave the order, that constitutes the question we are considering, and not whether he is to be excused for it or not.

Mr. PALMER. It is not a question of excuse. It is a question of justification. He was justified or he was not. If he was justified, he will be acquitted. If he was not justified, he will be convicted. What I am asking you is whether you are going to be satisfied with the verdict of the court-martial?

Mr. SIMS. Not if it acquits him. But right there let me say to the gentleman—he speaks about lynching in times of peace. Everybody thinks that is wrong, and of course there is no excuse for it. Does the gentleman expect soldiers coming from such a people, 10,000 miles away, will do better than they did at home?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly not; but the people of the South or the North, wherever lynchings occur, ought not to be condemned and denounced as murderers because lynching took place there. Nobody takes any such ground, and it is for that very reason that we object to this wholesale condemnation of the Army and of the Republican Administration because in individual instances men, under the stress of provocation which could not be endured, which no human being could endure, have committed these acts. Let me ask the gentleman: Suppose your tent mate in the Philippine Islands, or at any other place where you were, was captured under a flag of truce and was roasted for four hours by slow fire and then slashed to pieces with bolos, and suppose you got hold of the people that did it, what would you do?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I expect I would act pretty roughly. [Laughter.] But that is not a parallel case with the orders of the commanding general.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, well, all your malice and indignation seems to be devoted to Smith. What was done in pursuance of Smith's order?

Mr. SIMS. Samar was made a howling wilderness.

Mr. PALMER. It was a howling wilderness before the order was issued.

Mr. SIMS. Then what was the use of giving the order?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, you roll that matter under your tongue with the utmost delight and gusto. In point of fact, Samar was nothing but a howling wilderness, or a wilderness without the howl, before the order was issued. If nothing was done except what Major Waller did, it was not made a wilderness pursuant to Smith's order. You have not been able to point to a case, and there is not a case where any boy 10 years of age, or any woman, was ever killed in pursuance of Smith's order, and all this is like the devil shearing a hog—all cry and little wool.

Mr. SIMS. What use have we got for Samar if it was nothing but a howling wilderness before General Smith gave his order?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, we will make that bloom and blossom like the rose in spite of your prediction.

Mr. SIMS. Well, I did not mean to interrupt the gentleman to this extent, but he is talking about our denouncing the Army.

Mr. PALMER. That is what you are trying to back out of now.

Mr. SIMS. I demand an instance of our denouncing the whole Army.

Mr. PALMER. I have read the instances where it was done by the leaders of your party.

Mr. SIMS. Name one of them.

Mr. PALMER. They denounced the Army, the Secretary of War, and all the Republicans that were in any way responsible.

Mr. SIMS. I did not know that all the Republicans were in the Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. I say all the Republicans responsible for the presence of the Army in the Philippines, and you charge it upon the whole output.

What would be the condition of the people generally under any government that would probably be established can only be imagined. Would they enjoy greater liberty and better advantages than they now enjoy or which they will enjoy under the protection of the United States? In my opinion, the people of the Philippine Islands would, even under an American military government, enjoy a hundredfold more liberty and be far better protected in life and property than ever before, or than they would be if left at this time to attempt the impossible task of self-government.

The time to decide what shall finally be done with the Philippine Archipelago and its people has not yet arrived. The minority demands that an unqualified guaranty of independence shall be immediately made to the Filipinos. They prophesy that if it were done resistance would cease and submission take the place of insurrection. But who can verify such a prediction? If the measures already taken to improve the condition of the people of the islands does not convince them of the friendly intentions of the United States, all the paper promises that could be made would never satisfy them; they would not believe though one arose from the dead to give the assurance.

Suppose the United States concludes to abandon the Philippine Islands, what will be the probable, nay, the inevitable, consequences? The declared purpose of the insurgent Filipinos was to loot Manila and murder all the foreign-born population. These foreigners are English, Germans, French, Americans, and Spaniards. They own valuable property in the city and in the islands. The nations of which they are citizens are in the habit of demanding redress for wrongs done their subjects. Would England, Germany, and France have a just claim against the United States if the islands were abandoned and that purpose was carried out?

That would depend upon the obligations assumed by the United States when the sovereignty and title to the islands was conveyed by Spain. By the law of nations we were bound to protect the life and property of all the people who inhabit these islands and to maintain peace. Can that obligation be relinquished at pleasure by withdrawing our troops and surrendering the country?

We believe there is nothing left but to go forward in the plain path of duty and honor, teaching freedom and the art of self-government to that untutored people until they learn the lesson. Borrowing the brave words of the President:

> When they have shown their capacity for real freedom by their power of self-government, then, and not till then, will it be possible to decide whether they are to exist independently of the United States or to be knit to us by ties of common friendship and interest.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONRY].

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose at this time to enter into an exhaustive review of our relations with the Philippine Islands nor to criticise the policy and conduct of our Government during the past three years, with its attendant demoralizing effect upon the people of the country; nor do I propose for my text to seize upon isolated instances of barbarity and harrow up your feeling with stories of cruelty before which the blood runs cold and decent men recoil in horror.

When, however, we learn of an entire province ordered to torture and destruction by sword and torch in the name of the American people, we are compelled to give expression to a mighty indignation which can no more be restrained in its action than the whirlwind in its course, the rivers rushing on to the ocean, or the ocean rolling back its majestic tides. [Applause.]

For almost four years the Government has been at war with the people of the Philippine Islands. I am aware the Administration prefers not to dignify the situation as a state of war, but refers to the trouble as an insurrection.

But call it war or insurrection, we know that way out there in the Philippine Islands men are being killed, brave American soldiers on one side, unfortunate natives on the other.

It was but natural to expect during these four years many cruelties of a revolting nature would be committed as unavoidable incidents of a tropical conflict.

We were prepared to learn our boys had suffered at the hands of the natives torture and death.

This was the essential price we agreed to pay for our imperialism. The jewel money we gladly expended to bedeck our flag with the pendants of empire.

At first we hesitated; the finest intellect and moral courage of the country bade us pause and consider well the full significance of the course on which we entered. Then the hoarse partisan cry was uttered; commercialism at home and abroad, selfish interests, colonial ambitions, jingoism, all joined in discordant, passionate chorus:

> The flag has been uplifted—now, who will haul it down?

So the war went on. Apparently the people approved the action of the Government in sending an army of 50,000 men 8,000 miles away to carry the blessings of liberty and civilization, first in gun barrels, then in whisky barrels.

It mattered not how many of these men would come back as victims of hideous disease; it mattered not how many of them would be brought back as howling maniacs; it mattered not how many of them would never come back, but whose bones would be laid away forever in the jungle. I say the people apparently approved the war.

But it was not a genuine, healthy American feeling—not the kind of spirit which pervaded the country and moved the men who became our everlasting heroes on land and sea and in the council chamber in Revolutionary times [applause]; not the spirit which builded the foundations upon which rests to-day the soundest structural framework of constitutional liberty the world has ever witnessed. There was something lacking, something absent, something that could not quite arouse the enthusiasm of the American people. Aye, more, there was a strong suspicion struggling for expression that rather than carrying liberty and civilization and freedom and hope and happiness to an unfortunate people we were actually engaged in conflict to hold as unwilling subjects people who of right ought to be free and independent.

Yet the fighting went on. The American arms were successful, as they always must be.

But the spirit of dissatisfaction at home grew bolder and bolder. Rumors of outrages inflicted on helpless natives gained circulation and stories of cruel punishments applied to prisoners to compel them to testify against their own, began to worry the public mind. And while the busy wheel of industry sang its contented song, while the farmer, the miner, the merchant, and the mechanic all participated in the blessings of material prosperity never equalled by other lands since the beginning of related events, that noonday sun of satisfaction was clouded by horrible doubt and suspicion that somewhere in the world brutality was practiced under the American flag on unfortunate human beings, whose only crime was an ambition to establish their own government.

We had time and time again been assured that the war was ended, that peace was restored, and civil government faithfully administered was attracting the earnest support of intelligent natives.

Intermittently we would receive news of more fighting, then we were told the war we supposed had ended was being vigorously prosecuted, yet with "marked humanity and magnanimity."

Then came a mass of assertions, claims, charges, countercharges, bulletins, letters, statements, investigations, hearings, denials, contradictions, inconsistencies; nothing reliable, everywhere confusion. But all the letters, bulletins, and statements ever issued by all the bureaus of the Government—all were unavailing, all superfluous, all in vain. That dreadful disturbed feeling of uneasiness and unrest, that indescribable, undefinable emotion which can no more be analyzed than the element we know as electricity, stirred the whole American people with keenest indignation at the suggestion that outrage was committed and torture was inflicted on any human beings in the name of the American people.

What is this strange power that causes fear, apprehension, and anxiety? I can not tell. I do not know. I do not care. But that it had good reason to exist was definitely shown when, April 8 last, Major Waller, Captain Porter, and Lieutenant Halford testified in Manila that General Smith gave orders to kill all natives of Samar over 10 years old. On the 11th of April Major Waller admitted that he killed Filipinos as charged, but under instructions from Smith, and pleaded the justification of martial law.

April 14 private soldiers testified to the application of torture as a regular policy by officers and men of the Regular Army. Finally, on the 25th of April, at a court-martial held in Manila, Jacob H. Smith, a general officer in the United States Army, admitted through his counsel that he had given instructions to Major Waller to kill and burn and make Samar a howling wilderness, and that he did specify all over 10 years of age.

Oh, what an everlasting shame!

We who had been carrying on these three centuries the struggle for the uplifting of mankind. We who had reared to the memory of our great teachers marble and granite columns on foundations so firm and deep they seemed to penetrate to the center of the earth, forming an axis around which revolved in hope and confidence the freedom and humanity of the world. We who had planted our standard so high, waving on the pure free winds of liberty, piercing the fleecy clouds of heaven, the fluttering folds of our colors mingling and blending in consummate harmony with the drapery adorning the great throne before which the angels sang. [Loud applause.]

The camp fires of our soldiers, which for a hundred years sent forth the incense of liberty, now smoked over the desolate ruins of destroyed villages.

We had fallen to the brutal level of pagan colonizers, and were to kill and burn and destroy all that crossed our path.

How our English cousins will chortle with maudlin joy!

How every outrage perpetrated in the valleys of South Africa will be sturdily defended by the Government benches in Parliament, gleefully pointing to the precedent established by Smith in Samar.

Aye, Mr. President, it is well you should send your ambassadors to the coronation of Edward; it is a covert compliment to the English idea of civilization. The memories of millions of indescribable outrages committed in the name of English colonization in America and Africa, in Ireland and India are now approved, hallowed, and sanctified.

Send your ambassadors to the coronation of Edward; strike welcome hands as congenial spirits across the outraged bodies of Boer and Filipino; fold in bloody embrace the Empire sweltering in glory and in gore.

Send your ambassadors to the coronation of Edward; let their parchment commissions be decorated with the red blood of the innocent children of Samar; it is your strenuous guaranty that hitherto England has always been in the right and we have been in the wrong.

Send your ambassadors to the coronation of Edward; but send them not in the name of the American people, but rather as special pleaders of a partisan Administration seeking relief from the shame and stain of slaughter and the burdens of conscience by courting the favor of an Empire which centuries ago sold conscience for colonies and conquest. [Loud applause.]

General Smith made his confession in open court more than a month ago. It has never been withdrawn or qualified. Nay, his counsel defiantly claimed justification for his action and insultingly compared Smith to Grant.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this House wants to know, as the country wants to know, without unnecessary delay, without evasion or circumlocution, who is responsible for the order General Smith confesses to have issued.

I offered a resolution in this House the 27th day of April, which I will now ask the Clerk to read.

House resolution No. 230.

Whereas it is stated in the public press that at a court-martial held in Manila, P. I., April 25, 1902, Gen. Jacob H. Smith, an officer of the United States Army charged with conduct prejudical to good order and discipline, counsel for defense admitted that General Smith gave instructions to Major Waller to kill and burn and make Samar a howling wilderness, that he wanted everybody killed capable of bearing arms, and that he did specify all over 10 years of age: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives if said orders were issued with the knowledge and approval of the War Department; and if not, be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to ascertain and report to the House of Representatives whether said orders were issued by General Smith, acting on his own responsibility, or under the instructions of any superior officer.

Mr. CONRY. Another resolution, substantially the same in character, but not so definite in detail, was offered the same day.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommended the passage of an order simply asking for all the papers relating to the campaign in Samar.

Why this fear, Mr. Chairman? Why not answer the plain question? Is the War Department willing or does it refuse to assume responsibility for this "revolting" order?

Gentlemen of the House, the conscience of this country has not become so seared that it will tolerate in complacency the issuance of an order of this character. The country wants responsibility placed for this order, aye, if it leads right up to the table of the strenuous one. A gentleman high in the ranks of the Administration leaders denounces this order as "revolting," and insists that the Administration must not be held responsible. Yet the Administration knew substantially what was going on.

The general facts of the campaign were known to the entire Army. General Miles, on the 17th of February, wrote to the Secretary of War begging permission to go to the Philippines, and said in his letters: "The warfare has been conducted with marked severity."

The Secretary of War rebuked the veteran Miles on the 5th of March, refusing to consider his application for duty in the Philippines, and adds with superior knowledge: "It is not a fact the war has been conducted with marked severity; on the contrary, the warfare has been conducted with marked humanity and magnanimity on the part of the United States."

Did the Secretary of War know at the time he wrote this letter of the existence of the Smith order to kill and burn?

If he knew of it, is it not fair to assume that he approved of it by his silence, as we are not informed that Smith ever was rebuked for his infamous action?

If he knew of it and approved of it by his silence, how will we characterize his letter to General Miles, "that the war was being conducted with marked humanity and mananimity?"

If he did not know of the order, was he not negligent in the performance of his duty, and should he not be held for criminal carelessness?

I am in receipt of a letter from a distinguished clergyman in Boston—not a sensationalist, but a high-minded Christian spirit, who would shudder at the thought of gaining notoriety in the performance of his duties—in which he says:

Is the Secretary of War responsible? It seems as if he had been either culpably ignorant or deliberately deceived the people. He should explain his position. If he has been culpably ignorant, I believe the public outcry will compel the President to remove him, and if he has deceived the people, he should be impeached.

[Applause.]

I listened on the afternoon of May 5 to a brilliant defense of the Administration by one of its most distinguished spokesmen, but I listened in vain for one word criticising the author of the "revolting order" to kill and burn in the island of Samar.

I read 15 columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to find a single sentence condemning Smith, but I read in vain.

I heard much that day about provocation to torture, and while it was not urged as a defense, it was offered as an extenuation of the cruelty practiced on the natives.

It was urged that greater cruelties had been inflicted before in the history of the world; the Neronian persecutions, the outrages of the Tartar hordes in Russia, and the tortures of Alva and Torquemada, and as I listened I heard the defender of the Administration say, in what sounded to me a tone of disappointment:

I have heard of nothing of that sort in the Philippines.

And yet the Democratic party is held up to the world as abusing the Army. The American soldier may well cry out, "Spare me from my friends."

The substance of the Administration defense is:

Our enemies have acted as savages; let us become savages, too.

Because of your horrible atrocities in the Philippines, you have aroused the righteous wrath of the country, from which you now seek refuge by crying out, "The Democrats are attacking the Army."

Attacking the Army! Who is guilty of the cruelest attack ever made on the American Army? The Administration in power and the officers in command, who permitted, encouraged, and ordered torture applied to prisoners taken by American soldiers.

Soldiers merely carry out the orders of the commander in chief. Their first and most sacred duty is obedience.

They can not inflict torture and cruelty of their own accord. It is a violation of the rules of war, and they would be punished for disobedience. So we know that if barbarity exists in the Philippines, it is there as part of the war policy of the Administration.

And from competent testimony submitted, we learn that torture is inflicted by orders, and the reason alleged, the excuse offered, is that we are compelled to resort to such practices if we are to achieve success in our military operations.

Exactly the same reason Spain offered for her concentration camps in Cuba; the same excuse offered for her Weylerism, the moving cause of our war for the freedom of Cuba.

Now, the War Department is compelled to admit its inability to establish peace, unless we do in the Philippines what Spain did in Cuba.

The debate on this bill has gone on four weeks, during which time defender after defender of the Administration has adroitly taken up every discolored page in history to make the situation appear respectable. Apparently, however, conscience was not yet satisfied.

That restless, passionate, impulsive spirit which will not be confined within the constitutional bounds of Executive power burst into expression on Memorial Day over the soldier's grave.

We will waive the question of taste or propriety in selecting a day of most tender memories for the delivery of a partisan stump speech.

Recent royal associations aroused incipient imperial tendencies which gently remind us, "The king can do no wrong."

It was not what was said on that occasion, for the same thing had been said many times before, if not said quite so well, but that it should be found necessary to drag the Executive into a partisan debate.

The accumulated evidence of all other witnesses is insignificant beside this, as showing the thought uppermost in the Administration mind—anxiety to escape punishment for wrongdoing.

He, too, found refuge in the hope that torture in the Philippines would not be criticised while lynching occurred in this country, and he achieved a parliamentary triumph by his individual opinion that "these cruelties in the Philippines have been wholly exceptional and have been shamelessly exaggerated." He, too, believes that men who desire to abolish torture in the Philippines "traduce the Army."

When Theodore Roosevelt, a courageous volunteer officer of courageous volunteer soldiers, signed a round-robin attack on the War Department for its canned beef and other rotten military supplies served to our soldiers in Cuba, was he traducing the Army, or was he doing a great public service? [Loud applause.]

We can criticise the "water cure" only at the risk of traducing the Army, and when we complain of the brutality and inhumanity of concentration camps we are accused of assailing the American soldiers.

The American soldier—we love the American soldier. His record during a century and a quarter has been brilliant, chivalrous, glorious, without reproach and without stain, until the appearance of Smith.

The American soldier, from the farm on the hillside, from the lumber camp, from the stone quarry, from the mines, from the prairie, or from the crowded city, is to-day without a superior in the world.

Thousands there are to sound the praise of the American volunteer, in which praise I heartily join. My own ideal is the soldier from the great city.

The boys with fair faces, bright eyes, and fearless hearts, inexhaustible nervous energy, vitality, and strength; to him the joys of battle are not its spoils or loot or booty, but its peril, love of conflict, adventure, and glory.

The charge, the mad rush, the shock of battle are to him but the noisy echoes of his daily life; prodigal of his patriotism; ready to share his last cup of coffee with comrade or stranger; tender as a girl, yet will fight like a tiger, and when the battle is over will laugh and dress the wounds of friend and foe with like generosity.

For him there is no outrage, no barbarity. For him respect for woman is equaled only by love of country. The knightliest character in romance never equaled him in chivalrous action. From his earliest life, when his infant feet danced on the paved street of the crowded city to the music of the hurdy-gurdy, and later when the widowed mother spent perhaps the last dollar in the house to buy the uniform blouse that would enable her boy to march with the school regiment before the admiring eyes of the girls who filled the streets until he burned with the first grand passion, he was taught to love and respect and venerate woman.

He may swear vengeance on the enemy for the torture and death of a companion, but he will get his satisfaction like a soldier, in man fashion, with his weapon in his hands, facing an armed enemy.

An order to kill and burn and destroy all over 10 years of age is as "revolting" to this man as to a United States Senator, and the bitterest abuse, the most humiliating attack, the vilest slander he ever endured, was when he was ordered to kill all over 10 years of age.

I know him, not as an individual, not by the dozen, not by the score, but by the hundreds and thousands; the roll call of the army in the Philippines might well serve as a duplicate voting list of a Democratic ward in Boston. [Long-continued applause.]

April 23, almost two months ago, the Boston papers devoted considerable space to the testimony of two soldiers recently returned from the Philippines, where they had served with Company D, Twenty-sixth Infantry, United States Volunteers.

These men tell the story of the murder of Father Augustine, a Roman Catholic priest, at Bolo.

According to the testimony of these men, the priest was murdered by the application of the water cure; murdered—foully, cruelly murdered—on December 9, 1900.

The gentlemen charged with the investigation of affairs in the Philippines have never sought to establish or disprove the truth of this horrible charge.

Affidavits are at hand showing the names of all who participated in this brutal murder, yet notwithstanding two months have gone by since the charges were made public nothing has been done in the matter. It is quite possible hope exists in some quarters should the matter be kept quiet long enough action will be barred by the statute of limitations.

These same men tell of a campaign in Dungas, in July, 1900, when they were acting under orders to burn everything and take no prisoners.

At Dungas the company came to a hut where a native woman had just given birth to a child.

The woman and child were dragged from the hut, the shack was burned to the ground, and the woman and child were left to perish from exposure and starvation.

I have frequently been asked in recent years how the continued agitation of the Irish party was kept up and how it was the descendants of the Irish in this country for generations, many of whom had never seen Ireland, still continued to support the agitation.

Gentlemen, this outrage I have just described as perpetrated in the Philippines was the favorite pastime of the English soldiers in Ireland—to find a woman with child, drag her from her bed and throw her on the roadside, tear the roof from the cottage, and set fire to the household goods, and if a male member of the family could be found, hang him to the nearest gibbet.

This was the treatment English soldiers accorded to the Irish, and it can never be forgotten. England will never allow it to be forgotten, as she does the same thing in India, in South Africa, and wherever she sets the roughshod hoof of the conqueror.

When the children of your great grandsons shall assemble in this Chamber, when the history of the Fifty-seventh Congress shall have passed into peaceful oblivion and our names are forgotten, then will the bitterness and anger and hatred flash as fiercely in the bosom of the Filipino as it did in the days when Smith issued his infamous order to kill all over 10 in the island of Samar.

What do we Democrats propose to do? Briefly this: Establish independence in the Philippine Archipelago, issue a proclamation at once to the inhabitants of the Philippines that we believe they are and of right ought to be free and independent states, and notify the world that we propose to stand watch and see that the Filipinos are not molested in their desire to establish their own form of government.

This is the general proposition; let us perfect the details when we are in possession of all the facts.

It is my belief Congress can not act intelligently on this matter until we are in position to know the exact conditions existing in the Philippines. Let us appoint a commission thoroughly representative of both sides of the question and have it make a study of the country, not for the purpose of exploitation, not to ascertain its mineral wealth, not to count the acres of timber which constitute its noble forests, not to measure and calculate upon the fertility of its soil, but rather to sound the depths of gratitude and affection in the hearts of a people capable of great love. [Applause.]

Let us go there with clean hands and honest hearts, free from the stain of imperial ambition. Let us proclaim our purpose to the world and peace will follow war.

Which is the higher order of statesmanship, to secure the affection of a people, as we have done in Cuba, or to enforce the brutal submission of a people, as England has done in South Africa?

After all, courage and patriotism are the common possession of mankind. The inhabitants of the Tropics share these virtues alike, and in addition they inherit a trace of treachery and deceit which is abhorrent to us, but we can not cure that by sinking to their depth; rather must we raise them to our level.

One of the reasons offered to justify General Smith's order is that the children he ordered killed shared with their parents the hatred of Americans. The evidence from all sources goes to show we are more bitterly hated by the Filipinos than even Spain was. In the report of Major-General Otis on military operations and civil affairs in the Philippines, dated 1899, I find on page 70 the following paragraph:

> Even the women of Cavite Province, in a document numerously signed by them, gave me to understand that after all the men were killed off they were prepared to shed their patriotic blood for the liberty and independence of their country.

In connection with this sublime paragraph I want to add a reflection the great philosopher Franklin put in the mind of his friend David Hartley, a member of Parliament, during the Revolution:

> If a man naturally cool and rendered still cooler by old age is so warmed by our treatment of his country, how much must these people in general be exasperated against us. And why are we making inveterate enemies by our barbarity, not only of the present inhabitants of a great country, but of their infinitely more numerous posterity, who will in future ages detest the name of Englishman as much as the children of Holland now do those of Alva and Spaniard? This will certainly happen unless your conduct is speedily changed and the national resentment falls where it ought to fall most heavily—on your ministry or, perhaps, rather on the king whose will they only execute.

So our national resentment will fall most heavily where it ought to fall—on the Secretary of War, or on the President, whose will he only recognizes.

And well we may ask, Why are we making inveterate enemies by our barbarity, not only of the present inhabitants of a great country, but of their infinitely more numerous posterity?

Such is the price you agreed to pay for your imperialism. Did you estimate the full cost when you entered on your policy of exploitation? Torture, outrage, and murder, not in the heat of violent anger, excruciating pain, and mad passion, but in cold blood under orders. Such is the price you agreed to pay for your imperialism.

The carloads of maniacs passing through the country, the loathsome diseases festering in large cities and small towns—this was the price you agreed to pay for your imperialism. Your own conscience stifled, your own voice stilled forever, when the weak, struggling for liberty, are overcome by the strong. This is the price you agreed to pay for your imperialism. The Declaration of Independence prohibited in the Philippines. The most cherished patriotic custom observed in the city of Boston is the exercises held in Fanueil Hall on July 4. Since 1783—for one hundred and nineteen years—the people of the city have annually assembled to hear some distinguished citizen repeat the ancient story of patriotic purpose and review our patriotic faith. For one hundred and nineteen years the brightest boy in the public schools of Boston has read from the platform of Fanueil Hall the Declaration of Independence.

You have prohibited the Declaration of Independence in the Philippines. When will you prohibit it in the city of Boston? [Applause.]

You answer that all these things—torture, outrage, and murder in cold blood, the denial of the Declaration of Independence—are mere incidents of war.

Ah, gentlemen, have you ever paused to consider the impossible task of driving the spirit of liberty from the breast of man?

You are treating a violent organic trouble as a mere cutaneous affection. You seek for the cause of the eruption of Mount Pelee by arresting the village watchman.

And all for what? Mere temporary supremacy.

Right, justice, honor, freedom, humanity, and liberty are words blotted forever from the Republican platform.

Your Secretary of War, whom we had all known as an accomplished lawyer of true instincts and high ideals, has linked his fine talents to conspiracy and become the manipulator of dispatches which might prove injurious to the political interests of his chief.

The veteran soldier, Miles, was denied an opportunity to bring about peace lest his success might jeopardize the political future and fortunes of the hero who stood alone at San Juan Hill.

"Corruption wins not more than honesty."

Now, gentlemen, tell me, and tell me truly, way down deep in the innermost recesses of your hearts, where the fierce fires of partisanship are cooled by the soothing waves of pure patriotism, which would you prefer, guiding the destinies of the country in the hour of emergency, under which would the country retire to-night in fairer faith, under which would the business interests of the country breathe a freer breath, under which would the country at once find its proper sphere, empire or republic, under the strenuous administration of the polished equestrian of Oyster Bay or under the sound administration of Richard Olney, the Democrat? [Long-continued applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would ask the chairman of the Insular Committee whether he desires to have anyone speak on his side?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have one more speaker to-night. We are ready to proceed.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS].

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss all the phases of the legislation presented for our consideration in the Philippine measures. It is my purpose simply to call attention to a few of its features which I regard of far-reaching importance and so pregnant with possibilities of evil as to call for the exercise of the most unselfish patriotism upon our part in their consideration. In all the debates that have taken place in Congress upon this wretched chapter of our Philippine occupation I have heard no man declare in favor of making the Philippine peoples American citizens.

Neither the Republican nor Democratic party have declared in favor of such an issue, but the question has apparently been as to whether or not we were going to usurp imperial power and enter at once into a colonial policy. We have apparently forgotten that this is a Government of laws and not of men; that within the realm of delegated powers only the sovereignty of the expressed will is potential; that we may not disregard the effect and consequence of legislative acts, whether those acts are well considered or inadvisable. Aye, do we consider that to us is not confided the power of interpreting the scope and effect of our own provisions? If not, let us remember that the judicial branch of this Government, as separate and independent as ourselves, equally constrained by the obligations of a sacred pledge to be guided and controlled by the fundamental charter in their deliberations, will pass upon our work in the forum of personal and property rights, and its decrees may write forever and beyond our recall the status of our action.

The bills of the majority are couched upon the theory that we may take over the title to a country and a populous race of people and exercise sovereignty over them, administering their affairs without making them citizens. I do not believe it. A people thus dominated must be citizens under our flag.

For more than one hundred years the American Republic has been an exemplar of the grand acme of popular attainment—the sovereignty of the individual citizen, and liberty regulated by law. The German countess was wiser than she knew when she told the American traveler dining at her board that all Americans were born noblemen. The Declaration of Independence avowed it and our fathers on many a well-fought battlefield maintained our claim to royal dignity until the flag of freedom and equal rights was unfurled in a land fertilized by the blood of heroes, glorified by its precious memories and self-sacrifices, and nourished by the most exalted patriotism.

What has been the march of this high destiny is known of all men and need not be recounted here. It has expelled its adversaries and conquered the wilderness from ocean to ocean, carved out States, nourished agriculture, built populous cities, and planted civilization and citizenship beyond the western shores of the great Father of Waters. It came as a spiritual conception and blossomed into a physical reality. It has contributed to the literature of the material world its greatest theme and embellished its history with the brightest achievement. It has ennobled the citizen to the topmost rank of earthly favor and placed him next to the throne of the Almighty, whom, indeed, we only acknowledge as sovereign, denying to all others and ourselves, except of ourselves, the kingly scepter.

Such is the dignity of American citizenship, which is the invariable and common heritage of all who owe and must yield allegiance to the power which is symbolized by its flag, and such are the swelling thoughts that must enthrone themselves in the hearts of all those who love and defend it when duty calls and the hour of supreme self-sacrifice comes, if the stars are not to be plucked from their blue canopy or the stripes torn in threads from their spotless background. There is no place in this conception for a degraded citizenship, and the Supreme Court will not so hold. If you once enact civil government of a permanent character for the people of the Philippine Islands and conquer them into submission, you have then exercised the power reserved in the treaty to determine their civil and political status, and, having once exercised it, you may not be permitted to undo what you have incontinently done.

Have a care lest in the passage of this bill you may not terminate the trust character in which your sovereignty has hitherto been exercised, and brand your action with the election of permanent dominion. Remember that you may not escape the natural and legitimate effects of the law when once enacted, and that it remains for another equally independent authority to determine what those effects are or may be. The Constitution has given to Congress the right to confer citizenship. It has not given to Congress the right to take it away; therefore we may, here and now, confer citizenship upon those peoples, and we may do it indirectly and by the wholesale, without special designation; but when once done, the rights that attach to citizenship are fundamental, beyond the reach of vandal hands, safe and secure in constitutional protection, in the keeping of the people among the reserved rights that must find constitutional expression to be exercised.

The right to acquire territory is not disputed, is not doubted, and is everywhere admitted. The dispute arises over the manner and purpose for which territory may be acquired; but as the right to acquire territory is a political right and confided alone to the Congress, and as its action is not authorized to be reviewed or reversed in any other forum, it follows that such disputations are of no consequence except as they may serve to influence Congress itself in its action or move the people to amend the Constitution so as to limit this power. It may be stated as a moral restraint, that Congress should not impose sovereignty over an unwilling people, and I heartily coincide with such a statement, except where it is absolutely necessary to secure the safety and peace of our own people.

The point I make is that the validity of such an acquirement can not constitutionally be inquired into because of these reflections, and the effect of its action in acquiring territory can not be set aside or minimized in any tangible and effective way by the authority thereof. These are legal and constitutional questions and obligations with respect thereto. It may be assumed, then, that Congress can constitutionally acquire territory, with or without the consent of the people whose territory is acquired.

But it can not govern them permanently without conferring upon them the quality of citizenship, vesting them with an equitable constitutional title to local self-government which is legalized in statehood. Our declaration upon the subject of government is "that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and this is literally true as it concerns us, but it does not imply that power may not be exercised unjustly. To illustrate, if it were necessary to our own peace and safety to permanently take the Philippines, and we should do so, it would be the exercise of a just power in self-defense. To take them over against their will when it is not so necessary is a perversion of and an unjust exercise of that power, yet nevertheless constitutional. But it does not follow that because a wrong, not illegal in a constitutional sense, has been committed against them in forcing their nationality that it may be persisted in in the denial of constitutional rights after they are in. This may not be done, and herein lies the danger to ourselves. We may have to reckon with conditions from which we may not hereafter be able to separate ourselves so easily. It is for the exercise of unjust power and for the prostitution of our high ideals to selfish and sordid ends that we arraign the Republican party.

They have been, and are now, engaged in a war which possesses many, if not all, the elements of conquest, notwithstanding the Supreme Court in the Diamond Rings case decided that by the terms of the Paris treaty the United States legally obtained the sovereignty over the Philippine Islands. That sovereignty was of an ambiguous character and still remains so, leaving out all considerations of its existence as a matter of fact.

By the terms of the cession it was reserved for Congress to determine the civil and political status of the inhabitants, which necessarily included, and by which was meant, the final disposition of their habitat, as to dispose or to retain permanent control and dominion of their territory in itself necessarily involves, under our system and laws, their relationship to the Government or body politic, without other or special designation. By inserting the reservation in the treaty we clearly indicated that the act of cession alone was not to be construed as an avowal of a purpose of permanent, national ownership, but that we intended thereafter to decide whether the occupation should be permanent or temporary. This was not satisfactory to those people, and they have disputed our intervention with all the power they can muster from that time until the present, and a bloody war has been and is the consequence.

I will not stop here to discuss the horrors of that war. The revolting details have been thrashed over until the public must have sickened over the ghastly testimony. Rather, if I could, would I spread the black pall of utter oblivion over those wretched incidents, the only apology for their exploitation being a purpose to stop them. But I can not. I only deplore them as the natural and inevitable consequence of the warring contact of a civilized with a semicivilized or barbarous people.

I can not approve or condone offenses against humanity, but I insist that the blame should not and does not rest upon the Army as a whole, which must obey the constituted authority and be subjected to the maddening influences of an enervating climate, unknown surroundings, vexatious toil, treacherous, pitiless, and vandal foes. I place the blame where it belongs—upon the political party in power and the men who have been charged with the conduct of its affairs. But for the wretched commercialism and blundering incapacity that took root in their greed of gold and lust for empire, the awful spectacle of tortue might have been prevented and the unspeakable shame of the attitude in which they have placed our country might also have been prevented. What is that attitude? It is that, disregarding our obligations to exemplify in our conduct the high principles of liberty, equality, and independence that we profess, and should in our conduct exemplify, we have interposed our huge shadow between a people and the sun-lit goal of their similar aspirations.

This conquest may, and doubtless will, terminate in submission. What then remains for a complete establishment of sovereignty, and when so established how may it be disposed? Some gentlemen seem to think it can be put on and off like a garment. Is such indeed the portable character of this mighty essence? If so, who trundles the wheelbarrow in which its precious weight is deposited? Is it the American Congress or the American people? Is it confided to the servant or to the master? Where is the habitat of the royal prerogative to change the fundamental law? I answer, among the people or the legislatures of two-thirds of the States where the people have in part confided it. Do you say that Congress can by legislative enactment cede sovereignty for any purpose?

I ask you to place your finger upon the provision of the fundamental law which authorizes it. Do you say that Congress can undo anything that it may do? The plain answer to this is, it is not true, and the slightest investigation will demonstrate the fact. As, for instance, Congress may declare a citizen, but it can not decitizenize him, except as a punishment for crime. Do you say that the Constitution gives to Congress the power to dispose of and make all necessary rules for the government of the Territory? I answer yes, but that clause does not mention the disposition or dissolution of sovereignty.

Let us not confuse sovereignty with property. Territory here does not mean sovereignty. It means land. Its transfer does not mean the alienation of peoples or allegiance. It simply means the grant to private ownership, the fee-simple title to the soil over which the sovereignty of the people still reigns supreme, and which title, under the name of eminent domain, may be recalled by them upon the payment of compensation. You will note also that the power to make all needful rules respecting the territory disposed of is in the conjunctive, with the power to dispose of, and not in the disjunctive. If it were intended by this provision to enable Congress to thus dispose of peoples, why, then, did it empower Congress to govern them after their disposition? Such can not be held to be the meaning of the foregoing provision.

If authority be required to support the views I have here announced, they are not without respectable, nay, eminent, authority.

Mr. John Randolph Tucker, a high authority on constitutional law, in discussing this clause of the Constitution, when a member of Congress, in a report to Congress, also citing authorities sustaining his position, said:

The "territory belonging to the United States" is held by them for two purposes—as real property to be disposed of and as a domain for colonization by the people of the several States. Law is necessary and proper to fix the boundaries of territory for each new State within which people may settle and form that bond of sympathy and cooperative unity which makes the body politic. Congress must, subject to the supreme law of the Constitution, legislate for the embryo community until, full-formed, it shall be prepared to become one of the sisterhood of Commonwealths which make up the Union.

These views are sustained by many cases: American Insurance Co. v. Canter, 1 Peters, 511; United States v. Gratiot, 13 id., 526; Cross v. Hamson, 16 How., 164; Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How., 393; Beall v. New Mexico, 16 Wall., 535; Ferris v. Hughes, 20 Wall., 375; National Bank v. County of Yankton, 101 U. S. Rep., 129.

And they are strongly reenforced by the suggestion that sovereignty is anchored by and to the residence of American citizenship. Especially is this so where that citizenship is represented by an entire community or body of population whose situation and needs imperatively demand the exercise of civil government. It would be ridiculous to suppose such a body of American citizens retaining their nationality while their rights, personal and property, were controlled by another jurisdiction. It therefore follows that wherever American citizens reside in such a body that there must abide the sovereignty—which is simply the power of the United States to perform the functions which secure these rights—and, necessarily, this continues just so long as such citizenship and residence continues.

I have heard it declared that we might simply withdraw our troops and leave the sovereignty to those people, but surely this can not mean after citizenship has been established. In such an event what would we leave behind? American citizens and their personal and property rights, the reward of chance, the spoil of adventurous power. A withdrawal thus would simply take away the power and administration whose continued exercise in guaranty and protection the Constitution pledges. No, Mr. Chairman, sovereignty can not thus be displaced when once permanently established. The Constitution would be too strong or else it would be worthless in the degeneracy of men recreant to their oaths. The courts would yet remain open for the redress of grievances against American citizenship. We might not thus ingloriously and unworthily escape responsibility. These considerations only illustrate how difficult it would be to dispose of sovereignty permanently taken and established.

But what is the status? How may our difficulties be avoided, and what are our duties in the premises? We have not far to seek for the answer. We have an illustrious and glorious precedent in the case of Cuba. In that case we took over the trust sovereignty with the purposes of the trust declared, while we proceeded to the liberation of its stricken people. When the war closed we invited them to form a government, with which we treated as to the terms of our withdrawal. We have had recently the proud privilege of witnessing the unfurling of another free flag over a people whom we delivered and assisted to the dignity of citizenship in a new republic, born among the family of States.

Marvelous spectacle! Who can witness unmoved the grand climax of civic righteousness? Who in the distant years can read without wondering and reverential awe the record of the noble dignity and self-sacrifice which animated our peerless people in dealing with the rights of man and in the administration of those tremendous energies, strength, and resources with which the God of righteousness has clothed them? Who would stoop from this high estate or fall headlong from these alpine heights for sordid ends or graceless lapse of reason? In the case of the Philippines, a people, animated by the same high hopes and aspirations and struggling with arms in their hands for freedom, fell into our hands as an incident of war. As in the case of Cuba, we took over the waning, if not utterly destroyed, sovereignty of Spain in trust with our purposes not declared, but with power to elect its disposition.

Failing to declare our purpose, the right of our interposition was disputed, and is disputed to this day at the point of the bayonet, and millions of treasure and thousands of precious lives have been sacrificed in a horrible war. In the light of such glorious history written in the case of Cuba, how could our purposes have been perverted or why remain they now obscure? Let us not foreclose ourselves by the assumption of permanent sovereignty in the enactment of a law utterly inconsistent with a purpose or power thereafter to do otherwise. Let us at least accompany this law with an enacted declaration that it is only temporary, and that we propose to exercise the trust by inviting and assisting those peoples to form a government with which we can treat as to the terms of our aid and withdrawal. Let us, then, insist upon protection for all who have incurred enmity by befriending or seeming to befriend our cause, and for all those in whose favor a national obligation is outstanding.

Let us retain exclusive coaling stations if we will and trust to our own merit and enterprise for commercial advantages which we may be able to obtain. They will eagerly grant all these and forgive, if they do not forget, the grievous blunder that has slain thousands of their citizens and our own. Let us not persist in our mistake until we have conquered sovereignty and changed the whole constitutional relationship. Let us admit the invalid and impossible character of our title and call a halt in the prosecution of such a claim. The Philippine people have pleaded an outstanding title to the Spanish claim upon which we have declared. Let us admit it and dismiss the case. I doubt the sensitive honor that could be wounded by such a course. The world would not fail to justly appreciate our motive and applaud it, or if any power should misconstrue it as an evidence of weakness and seek to profit by an invasion of our rights, why let them, at their peril and at their own discretion.

We are yet in a position to do this thing. The passage of the resolution empowering the President to govern the islands until Congress acted, in a time of war, did not clothe him with any more power than he then possessed, and only shows that Congress was not ready to decide the momentous question confided to its keeping.

It is different now. We have had time to deliberate and we are now deliberating.

Mr. Chairman, there are those who believe and maintain that the Constitution follows the flag; that is to say, that wherever the flag is hoisted as an emblem of permanent sovereignty and wherever the jurisdictional dominion of the Government of the United States is asserted that there, of its own force, by the very act which asserts that sovereign dominion, independent of a legislative interpretation of that act, the Constitution goes to authorize that sovereignty, to define it, to limit it, and to secure the blessings of liberty to the people over whom the shadow of the great powers it organizes, limits, and equalizes is thrown.

Indeed, it is quite impossible for me to conceive of any jurisdiction existing in the Government separate from and independent of the instrument by which alone that Government is formed and exists. There has never been a decision of the Supreme Court to this good day which affirms such a doctrine. These were the opinions of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case (19 Howard, p. 449). He said:

* * * But the power of Congress over the person or property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our Constitution and form of Government.

The powers of the Government and the rights and privileges of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the Constitution itself; and when the Territory becomes a part of the United States the Federal Government enters into possession in the character impressd upon it by those who created it. It enters upon it with its powers over the citizen strictly defined and limited by the Constitution, from which it derives its own existence and by virtue of which alone it continues to exist and act as a Government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it, and it can not when it enters a Territory of the United States put off its character and assume discretionary or despotic powers which the Constitution has denied to it. It can not create for itself a new character, separated from the citizens and the United States and the duties it owes to them, under the provisions of the Constitution. The Territory being a part of the United States, the Government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out; and the Federal Government can exercise no power over his person or property beyond what that instrument confers, or lawfully deny any right which it has reserved.

Again, it was stated by Chief Justice Chase in the case of Minor v. Happersett (21 Wall., 162), that—

Allegiance and protection are in this connection—that is, in relation to citizenship—reciprocal obligations. The one is a compensation for the other; allegiance for protection and protection for allegiance.

In the light of such cogent reasoning as this, it would be hard, indeed, to maintain the contrary view. And if such be the fact, what, then, would be the effect of such constitutional extension over the people or inhabitants of territory, if the act or the circumstances of the assumption of sovereignty carried with it the impress of permanency?

Would it not have the effect of a collective naturalization and constitute the inhabitants of such territory citizens of the nationality into which they are thus incorporated, endowing them with constitutional rights that, once acquired, defy the antagonism of legislative hostility?

In Osborn v. United States Bank (9 Wheat., 738–827), Chief Justice Marshall said:

A naturalized citizen becomes a member of the society, possessing all the rights of a native citizen and standing, in the view of the Constitution, on the footing of a native. The Constitution does not authorize Congress to enlarge or abridge those rights. The simple power of a national legislature is to prescribe a uniform rule of naturalization, and the exercise of this power exhausts it so far as respects the individual. The Constitution then takes him up, and among other rights extends to him the capacity of suing in the courts of the United States, precisely under the same circumstances under which a native might sue.

In the Wong-Kim Ark case this latter case was referred to approvingly by Mr. Justice Gray, who said:

The power of naturalization, vested in Congress by the Constitution, is a power to confer citizenship, not a power to take it away.

In the Slaughterhouse Cases, Mr. Justice Miller, in discussing the rights of American citizenship in contradistinction to citizenship in a State, enumerated some of those rights as follows:

But lest it should be said that no such privileges and immunities are to be found, if those we have been considering are excluded, we venture to suggest some which owe their existence to the Federal Government, its national character, its Constitution, or its laws.

One of these is well described in the case of Crandall v. Nevada (6 Wallace, 36), it is said "to be the rights of the citizens of this great country, protected by implied guarantees of its Constitution" to come to the seat of government to assert any claim he may have against that Goverment, to transact any business he may have with it, to seek its protection, to share its offices, to engage in administering its functions. He has the right of free access to its sea ports through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted, to the subtreasuries, land offices, and courts of justice in the several States, and, quoting from the language of Chief Justice Taney, it is said "that for all the great purposes for which the Federal Government was established we are one people, with one common country. We are all citizens of the United States." And it is as such citizens that their rights are supported in this court in Crandall v. Nevada.

Another privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the Federal Government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. Of this there can be no doubt, nor that the right depends upon his character as a citizen of the United States. The right to peaceably assemble and petition for redress of grievances and the privilege of the right of habeas corpus are rights of the citizens guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

The right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several States, all rights secured to our citizens by treaties with foreign nations, are dependent upon citizenship of the United States and not citizenship of a State. One of these privileges is conferred by the very article under consideration. It is that a citizen of the United States can, of his own volition, become a citizen of any State of the Union by bona fide residence therein, with the same rights as other citizens of that State. To these may be added the rights secured by the thirteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment and by the other clauses of the fourteenth next to be considered.

It has been held that the admission of a State, without other or special designation, effected a collective naturalization.

It is not perceived why the absorption of a people and a territory into the permanent sovereign dominion does not also effect a collective naturalization, as it destroys their former nationality and creates a new nationality.

In the former case all the rights of citizenship, including the political franchises, are conferred or confirmed. In the latter case all the rights of citizenship are conferred, save the political franchises, which are withheld in trust and exercised by the Congress until such time as the Territorial inhabitants are fitted to enjoy and receive them. And herein is developed the reason why Congress can not voluntarily, by legislative action, withdraw sovereignty from a territory once permanently acquired, because the inhabitants, who are American citizens, have the constitutional right to be clothed with the full political franchise, in the admission to statehood at some future time, and the constitutional guaranty that Congress can not, by cession or withdrawal of sovereignty, deprive them of that right.

In the light, then, of these considerations it becomes important to inquire whether by the terms of the treaty the sovereignty acquired was temporary or permanent.

I am aware that the Supreme Court in the Diamond Rings cases came perilously near holding that it was a permanent acquisition. Mr. Justice Fuller said:

No reason is perceived for any different ruling as to the Philippines. By the third article of the treaty Spain ceded to the United States "the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands," and the United States agreed to pay to Spain the sum of $20,000,000 within three months. The treaty was ratified; Congress appropriated the money; the ratification was proclaimed. The treaty-making power, the executive power, the legislative power, concurred in the completion of the transaction.

The Philippines thereby ceased, in the language of the treaty, "to be Spanish." Ceasing to be Spanish, they ceased to be foreign country. They came under the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion of the United States, and so became territory of the United States over which civil government could be established. The result was the same, although there was no stipulation that the native inhabitants should be incorporated into the body politic, and none securing to them the right to choose their nationality. Their allegiance became due to the United States and they became entitled to its protection.

But it is said that the case of the Philippines is to be distinguished from that of Porto Rico because on February 14, 1899, after the ratification of the treaty, the Senate resolved, as given in the margin, that it was not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippines into citizenship of the United States, nor to permanently annex those islands.

We need not consider the force and effect of a resolution of this sort if adopted by Congress, not like that of April 20, 1898, in respect of Cuba, preliminary to the declaration of war, but after title had passed by ratified cession. It is enough that this was a joint resolution; that it was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 26 to 22, not two-thirds of a quorum; and that it is absolutely without legal significance on the question before us. The meaning of the treaty can not be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of those who may have voted to ratify it. What view the House might have taken as to the intention of the Senate in ratifying the treaty we are not informed, nor is it material; and if any implication from the action referred to could properly be indulged it would seem to be that two-thirds of a quorum of the Senate did not consent to the ratification on the grounds indicated.

The only reason, therefore, that relieves the situation from an adjudication in this case is found in the fact that, for the purposes of that case, it was not necessary to determine whether the sovereignty was permanent or temporary, but simply to determine whether the islands, after the treaty, with respect to our tariff laws, were a foreign country, and not whether their allegiance to the United States was temporary or permanent.

It is true that it was insisted that because the Senate passed a resolution after the treaty to the effect that by the ratification it was not intended permanently to annex them, and that for this reason they remained foreign territory, and that the court dismiss this suggestion as immaterial. It might and doubtless would have been differently held, had it been necessary, in the determination of the question before the court, to have passed upon the permanent or temporary character of the sovereignty, and had the real question been made that by the express terms of the treaty the sovereignty was necessarily temporary until the Congress decided whether it should be permanent.

That question is up to us for determination now, and it may not be pretermitted in the reckless fashion proposed by the majority. They have been urged to take their stand upon one side or the other of this tremendous and far-reaching issue, and their reply is that it will be time enough in a generation, two generations, or three generations hence to make a decision, while they deliberately bring in a bill which, in its terms, involves our inextricable association with those people for a time, the end of which no man can perceive, and which they confess and contemplate covers periods of generations. They organize civil government and extend the judicial power to those people without any qualification of time or condition. They contemplate and prepare for situations of never-ending complications and attachments. They create obligations calling for the continued ownership and dominion of national sovereignty, and in doing this can they hereafter be permitted to say that it was temporary and that by their action they have not accomplished a permanent sovereignty and thus completed the naturalization of the present body of the population of those islands?

I wish also to present the case in another aspect,

Grant, for the sake of the argument, that the passage of either one of these bills presented by the majority may not confer upon the people of the Philippine Islands American citizenship, and that if it should in fact do so, the Supreme Court can be relied upon to amend the Constitution by judicial interpretation and hold that it does not, the condition upon which you are entering, for which you are preparing, and which you evidence by the long period that you say will be necessary to prepare those people for self-government, and the pledge to it, in the proud boast which all of you are felicitous in making, that you will solve the problem of self-government for them, will inevitably lead to a condition of American citizenship for them through the operation of other well-settled constitutional principles.

The priceless boon of American citizenship may be conferred, as evidenced by the following provisions of our Constitution:

The Congress shall have power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization.

And—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

This latter provision might seem at first glance to be a limitation upon the first, but in the case of The United States v. Wong-Kim Ark (169 U. S.), decided in March, 1898, it was held that it does not affect or qualify the right of naturalization conferred in the previous section, but was in addition thereto.

The whole subject of citizenship and the history of our naturalization laws are very thoroughly discussed in this case, and I commend it, and the authorities therein cited, to the careful investigation of those who are to vote upon this bill.

Another observation is to be made with reference to this latter provision, and that is it recognizes citizenship of the United States to be distinct and independent from citizenship in a State, and that citizenship, by birth or naturalization, may be acquired without residence in a State.

Mr. Justice Miller in the Slaughterhouse Cases (16 Wallace, p. 36) said of this provision:

It had been said by eminent judges that no man was a citizen of the United States except as he was a citizen of one of the States comprising the Union. Those who had been born and resided always in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, though within the United States, were not citizens. Whether this proposition was sound or not had never been judicially determined.

As to condition after its enactment he said further in the same case:

The first observation we have to make on this clause is that it puts at rest both the questions which we stated to have been the subject of differences of opinion. It declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and it overturns the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States. That its main purpose was to establish citizenship of the negro can admit of no doubt. The phrase "subject to its jurisdiction" was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States.

The next observation is more important, in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is that the distinction between citizens of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

If these be sound principles of constitutional law, every day and hour that we remain in the Philippines after the enactment of either of the measures proposed by the majority but further complicates our difficulties.

As it is now, and as it is viewed by myself, every child born in that territory is born into the civil and political status liable to be determined by our action. If that determination is to be permanent sovereignty, how long will it take by birth, think you, to Americanize that population, thus wrenching from our hands the legislative power to resume the status quo and fastening upon us the brands of constitutional wedlock?

Ah, gentlemen, it is in vain you would postpone your purposes. Time and circumstances, inexorable effects from causes, wait not a man's convenience, and yet this seems to be the prevailing idea, as evidenced by the testimony of Governor-General Taft and others, taken at the hearings before the Senate committee, which are inserted here from the reports of the same in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

QUESTION OF STATEHOOD.

Senator CARMACK. You think, then, it is an open question whether the people of the Philippine Islands—islands populated with eight or ten million Asiatics—should be admitted to the full rights of American citizenship or whether or not an archipelago so populated should be admitted to statehood in the Union? You think it is an open question?

Governor TAFT. I think it is a question that I would not answer two or three generations before it will arise. I think the great evil to-day is the discussion of something that is utterly impossible of settlement to-day. The thing the Filipino people need to-day is a stable government under the guidance of American control, teaching them what individual liberty is and training them to a knowledge of self-government, and when they have that, the question of what relations shall then exist between the islands and this country may be settled between them and the citizens of the United States.

But to attempt to decide in advance something that it is utterly impossible wisely to decide now, it seems to me, with deference to those who differ with me, very unreasonable.

Senator CARMACK. I was speaking of it from the standpoint of the people of the United States, as to whether you thought it was a question of possibility——

Governor TAFT. What the people of the United States may think, or what they ought to think, fifty or a hundred years from now I do not venture to say.

Senator PATTERSON. It is a century problem?

Governor TAFT. It is quite possible, as we say in our report, that it may take a generation, or two generations; but no matter how long it is, it is in my judgment the duty of the United States to continue a government there which shall teach those people individual liberty, which shall lift them up to a point of civilization of which I believe they are capable, and which shall make them rise to call the name of the United States blessed.

I have thought over this subject a great deal; we have become intensely interested in the problem, and of course motives, the charge of which we can not avoid, are given to us in reaching such a conclusion; but if I ever was convinced of anything in my life it is that the problem which the United States there has is a great problem worthy of its solution, and which, when solved by establishing a stable government there under the guidance of American control, will redound to the honor and the benefit of this country, and I am proud to have to do with that work.

Senator CARMACK. You say the great trouble in all this matter has been that we are thinking about what may happen a generation or two generations from now. If the possession of the Philippine Islands by the United States involves the possibility of an archipelago 7,000 miles away, inhabited by people of an Asiatic race, becoming a State of the Union fifty or a hundred years from now, do you not think it is a question which deserves consideration now? Do you not think we ought to consider what may happen fifty years from now?

Governor TAFT. No, sir; and I will say why. Nothing that can to-day be said to the Filipino people in the nature of a promise as to the form of government which may take place after an established stable government shall be formed, could be otherwise than misleading to them and confusing in establishing that government.

It would at once begin the agitation among those who desire that separation to have that separation, because, in their opinion, they are fitted for it at once. It would drive away from the support of the stable government that conservative element who are strongly in favor of American guidance and control, because they would anticipate an early change.

They would think they would early be left without the support which the presence of the American Government necessarily gives, and the promise of something in the future, instead of helping to establish, would render unstable any government which was attempted to be established.

TESTIMONY OF GENERAL HUGHES AS TO CAPACITY OF FILIPINOS FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT AND EFFECT OF AMERICAN WITHDRAWAL.

VISAYANS' CAPACITY FOR CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you think of their capacity for civil government?

General HUGHES. My personal opinion is that it will be a long time before they are qualified to run a civil government of their own. I understand your question to relate purely to the Visayans?

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I mean.

General HUGHES. I should say not inside of two generations. The people have no earthly idea of equity. They simply know their own wishes, and they have no regard for the wishes of others.

The CHAIRMAN. If left to themselves what sort of government, in your opinion, would they establish?

General HUGHES. They would try, undoubtedly, to establish a republic of some kind, and they would do it. The ordinary Tao of the Visayans is one of the most gullible creatures the world contains. He will believe anything he is told by his acknowledged superior, no difference how absurd the statement is, and there is the great strength that their leaders have over them—the enormous ies that are published to them as to their plans and what is going to take place. They gull them right along.

The latest I got hold of from Lukban to his people was that a German fleet would be in those waters at such a date to blow the Americans out, and that they would then secure their independence. That was the last one I heard.

I only introduce these extracts to show the length of time in which we are expected to solve the problem. I should much rather have heard these gentlemen explain the principles upon which we are authorized and justified in postponing our decision with reference to making citizens of the Filipinos than to hear them state that it is better to postpone. I am sure that our dealings with the Indian tribes and our control of them can not be taken as a precedent, because the Constitution itself recognizes their separate existence and authorizes our dealings with them as dependencies.

Subsection 3 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution provides as follows:

The Congress shall have power to * * * regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

This recognition is also found in other provisions, and with reference thereto the Supreme Court, in the Wong-Kim Ark case, said, referring to the case of Elk v. Wilkins (112 U. S., 94):

The only adjudication that has been made by this court upon the meaning of this clause "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" in the leading provision of the fourteenth amendment is Elk v. Wilkins (112 U. S., 94), in which it was decided that an Indian, born a member of one of the Indian tribes within the United States which still existed and was recognized as an Indian tribe by the United States, who had voluntarily separated himself from his tribe and taken up his residence among the white citizens of the United States, but who did not appear to have been naturalized or taxed, or in any way recognized or treated as a citizen, either by the United States or by the State, was not a citizen of the United States, as a person born in the United States "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," within the meaning of the clause in question.

That decision was placed upon the grounds that the meaning of those words was "not merely subject in some respect or degree to the jurisdiction of the United States, but completely subject to their political jurisdiction and owing them direct and immediate allegiance;" that by the Constitution, as originally established, "Indians not taxed" were excluded from the persons according to whose numbers representatives in Congress and direct taxes were apportioned among the several States, and Congress was empowered to regulate commerce, not only "with foreign nations" and among the several States, but "with the Indian tribes;" that the Indian tribes, being within the territorial limits of the United States, were not, strictly speaking, foreign states, but were alien nations, distinct political communities, the members of which owed immediate allegiance to their several tribes and were not part of the people of the United States; that the alien and dependent condition of one of those tribes could not be put off at their own will without the action or assent of the United States, and that they were never deemed citizens, except when naturalized, collectively or individually, under explicit provisions of a treaty or of an act of Congress; and, therefore, that Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States, members of, and owing immediate allegiance to, one of the Indian tribes (an alien, though dependent power), although in a geographical sense born in the United States, are no more born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, within the meaning of the first section of the fourteenth amendment, than the children of subjects of any foreign government born within the domain of that government or the children born within the United States of ambassadors or other public ministers of foreign nations. And it was observed that the language used in defining citizenship in the first section of the civil rights act of 1866, by the very Congress which framed the fourteenth amendment, was all "persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed."

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that these gentlemen are right: that we have power to own colonies and to wield the jurisdiction of empire over a subject race; that the Supreme Court will sanction such a policy; but if the question could have been presented to the fathers who, stung with its intolerable indignities and stimulated with the hope of equality before the law, periled their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor for the emancipation of our princely race, we can have no doubt as to what their verdict would have been.

It was the actual attempt at the exercise of unwarranted power by the General Government in the enactment of the alien and seditions laws that called the Democratic party into existence, lost the Presidency to Mr. Adams, and effected the demise of the Federal party. It has from that time to the present resisted aggressions against constitutional liberty and equality, insisting upon a strict construction of the Constitution and loyal obedience to its mandates as the only means of preserving the liberty that was handed down from the fathers. [Applause.] When it ceases to do that its mission will have ended and the citadel of equal rights will crumble under the ceaseless grind of selfish interest and the remorseless sweep of unbridled power. It stands to-day the enemy of centralized power and the champion of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. [Applause.] As a Democrat, giving loyal and cheerful allegiance to the Constitution of my country, I have felt it my duty to call attention to this branch of the question, which, it seems to me, has been too much overlooked.

The measure proposed by the minority decides the question against permanent dominion over the Philippines and proposes to assist them to a stable government, with such provisions regarding our self-interests as we can, in all justice, good conscience, and good faith, demand, guarding against the danger of citizenship. Let us not contaminate our civilization with the contagion of the Orient. Let us not inoculate our system with the germ of imperialism. Let us decide the civil and political status of the people of the Philippine Islands to be independence in a nation of self-governing people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER].

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this question has taken a wide range. To quite an extent the opponents of our policy in the Philippines have devoted their time to making attacks on the Army. Officers and soldiers alike have been the subject of indiscriminate abuse. But this bill seeks to reduce the military power in the Philippines, to enlarge the civil power, and give a much larger measure of local self-government to the Filipinos than they now enjoy. Does any one object to that? Is not that a step in the direction that all Democrats and Republicans seek to go? There is a substantial agreement on all hands that whatever may be the ultimate future of the islands, our duty will compel us to remain there for a long time. With very few exceptions, no one thinks we ought to get out now and leave the natives who have been our friends without protection.

Any government that any class of natives might establish now would go to a bloody ruin within six months. The programme of the opposition recognizes this, and if the gentlemen on the other side think that the power now exercised by the army in the Philippines is an evil, why do they not join with us in passing a bill which will lessen that power and give a larger measure of local self-government to the natives? An indiscriminate denunciation of everyone who is trying to do something, an endless discussion of theoretical questions without suggesting any practicable and workable remedy for alleged wrongs, never cured an evil yet and never will. As Carlyle said:

> The astonishing intellect that occupies itself in splitting hairs, and not in twisting some kind of cordage and efficient draft tackle to take the road with, is not to me the most astonishing of intellects.

The progress of the world through all time has been due to men of courage and enthusiasm, men who made mistakes, who often erred and stumbled, but in spite of all advanced. To such men, not to the conservatives, we owe our liberties and our progress. The country never took a step in advance that the air did not ring with outcries regarding a fractured constitution and a ruined and enslaved people. Some men are so constituted that they can always see the celebrated horseman cinching up his saddle preparatory to a dash over the ruins of the Constitution.

James Russell Lowell, in speaking of such men, said:

> The word conservative, as well as I can understand it, is the convenient formula by which to express the average want of opinion of all who are out of place, out of humor, or dislike the dust which blinds and chokes whoever is behind the times.

That definition covers every man who has spoken against this bill and every anti-imperialist in this country. What is the objection to the proposed legislation? It is said that it gives to the President extraordinary and previously unheard of powers and inaugurates a colonial policy for this Government never dreamed of by the fathers of the Republic. Some gentlemen who oppose the bill would have you believe that a colonial policy for this country originated with President McKinley. On the contrary, it is as old as the country itself. The first treaty that this country ever negotiated was the treaty of alliance with France, in 1778, and the fifth article of that treaty is as follows:

> If the United States should think fit to attempt the reduction of the British power remaining in the northern parts of America or the islands of Bermudas, those countries or islands, in case of success, shall be confederated with or dependent upon the said United States.

Colonies were then called dependencies. The fathers of this Republic, under that treaty, took the right to seize Canada and the Bermudas and incorporate them into the Union or hold them as colonies.

Section 3 of Article IV of our Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States. Was not this provision intended to give Congress absolute power over territory—power to govern such territory as a colony should Congress see fit to do so? That section was drafted by Gouverneur Morris, and in answer to a question as to its precise meaning he wrote:

> I always thought when we should acquire Canada and Louisiana it would be proper to govern them as provinces and allow them no voice in our councils. In wording the third section of the fourth article I went as far as circumstances would permit to establish the exclusion.

Yet we are told that the fathers of the country never dreamed of a colonial policy, and the shades of Jefferson are invoked to rebuke our imperialistic innovations. Why the storm some people are making about our government of our new possessions is a mere zephyr compared with the storm that broke about the devoted head of Jefferson when he purchased and began the government of Louisiana. He purchased Louisiana as he might have purchased a horse or a mule of one man, Napoleon, and for months after it became the territory of the United States it had no government but the will of the President, and it was treated as foreign soil for certain tariff purposes. Finally Congress, with the approval of the President, framed a government for the new territory. Under the provisions of that act Louisiana was divided into two parts, the Territory of Orleans and the district of Louisiana.

It is interesting to know what the immortal Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, thought about governing the people of the territory of the United States without their consent. Under that act, in the Territory of Orleans, Jefferson appointed the governor, the secretary, and every member of the council, which was the only legislative body of the Territory. That is, the people of the Territory of Orleans were not allowed to elect a single member of their legislature, while under the bill reported from the Insular Committee and now before this House, when order is restored the Filipinos can elect every single member of the popular branch of their legislature.

In the Territory of Orleans Jefferson's governor really made the laws, for he drafted them, and all the power the council had was to accept or reject them. The council could not even amend one of the governor's bills. In the district of Louisiana Jefferson and the Congress went even further in the line of what our friends on the other side call imperialism, for there a governor and judges appointed by Jefferson were made the sole law-making power.

The Federalists, who were the anti-imperialists of Jefferson's time, denounced him as a worse tyrant than Charles I. When the Federalists talked about the constitutional rights of the people of Louisiana, Jefferson's friends in Congress said, "Louisiana is territory purchased by the United States and not a State." They said, "Whatever limitation the Constitution fixed to the power of Congress over States, it fixed no limitation to the power of Congress over territory." They further said they would govern Louisiana, not by any grant of power in the Constitution, but by the right of acquisition, and that right they would use as they saw fit, and they did so govern, and with the approval of the country except only a few noisy anti-imperialists.

I wonder how our Democratic friends would like it if we should take them at their word and go back to what they call the simple, republican, constitutional methods of Jefferson in governing the people of the territory of the United States.

But it is said that Jefferson did not use the Army to coerce the people of Louisiana. No; they were too weak to resist. They could only protest against the government thus forced upon them. But Jefferson was ready to use the Army, and would have used it if a single hand had been raised in resistance to our authority. Read his message to Congress in January, 1804, in which he states that he called out the militia in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee and held the troops in readiness to crush out any opposition that might develop in Louisiana.

When this storm against Jefferson was at its height on account of the purchase of Louisiana, some timid souls proposed that the control of the Mississippi River be held and all the rest of the territory be sold, and the opposition replied that the territory west of the Mississippi was absolutely worthless, and that no power would be fool enough to buy. Suppose the proposal of the anti-imperialists of that day had been adopted, a customer found, and that territory or any part of it sold, what would have been the fate of the men who carried it through? Would not their names and memories have been buried in obloquy, however good their motives, as men who had sold the choicest possessions of this country to the foreigner?

When Alaska was purchased it was said over and over again on this floor that that country was absolutely worthless, and that Russia had been trying for years to give it away. And yet, is there a man on the other side of the House who would not vote to go to war with England to-morrow over the possession of any single acre of that territory? The anti-imperialists, like the poor, we have always with us, and they have venomously fought every extension of the boundaries of the country. Why, if some of them in the old days could have had their way, there never would have been a State added to this Union west of Pennsylvania.

There are just two courses open to us in dealing with the Philippines. One is to go on as we have begun and carry law and order and enlightenment to those people, and the other course is to get out now and stay out and allow England or France or Germany or some nation that has the courage and the ability to do the work we ought to do—to take up the task that will fall from our incompetent and nerveless hands.

Every observer agrees that the Filipinos can not govern themselves now; that for the present at least they must be guided and controlled by a strong hand. We will not admit that we lack the courage and the ability to deal with this situation and to perform the work that civilization demands. We will not turn the islands over to any foreign power now or in the future. Resistance to our authority, if any still exists, is now confined to a very small section of the islands, and comes from bushwhackers and bandits. All open and organized resistance has ceased. There is little left there for the Army to do, and our soldiers are fast coming home. I wish to read as a part of my remarks just a paragraph from the report sent to the Senate by Secretary Root on Thursday of this week:

In the middle of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, there were about 70,000 American soldiers in the islands. That number is now reduced to about 23,000. Orders have now been issued for the return of the Eighth, Fifteenth, Twenty-fourth, and Twenty-fifth Infantry, and a squadron of the Tenth Cavalry, and when these orders have been executed the number of American troops in the Philippines will have been reduced to 18,000. For the past six months we have been bringing troops home as rapidly as we could do so economically by the use of our own transports. Quarantine requirements have caused some delay in the movement of transports, but we are bringing the men home more rapidly than we can provide accommodations for them until appropriations contained in the pending appropriation bill for the support of the Army become available.

A very great majority of the people in the Philippines are happy and contented and prosperous under American control. We will crush the few remaining bands of bandits and we will restore order, and then we will give to those people all the local self-government they are capable of exercising. We will educate them, develop their country, build schoolhouses, churches, and railroads, and as they advance we will give them a larger and larger share in their government. Whether we will ever give them absolute independence is a question that can be carefully considered in the years that must elapse before they are fitted for it, and in deciding that question we will take into consideration their good as well as ours.

The programme of the opposition necessarily contemplates years of American control before these people can comply with its conditions so as to secure independence. Let us cross that bridge when we get to it. Let us make no promises that we will either break or regret. In my opinion long before these people are fitted for self-government they will realize the enormous advantage to them of their connection with this country, and they would no sooner think of breaking it than Australia would think of breaking her connection with England.

They say we are governing the Filipinos without their consent. This country has always been governing territory without asking the consent of the people residing therein. There are numberless instances of it. Forty years ago the people of this country were engaged in a great war, costing billions of treasure and hundreds of thousands of precious lives, in order to impose upon the people of the South a government to which they would not consent. We have nearly 7,000,000 colored people here in the South—American citizens all. Is their consent to the government over them ever asked?

Never; and at the peril of their lives they dare not question it or attempt to exercise any of the political rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution. Apparently the country has come to the conclusion that there is no remedy for this, and that the South must be left to deal with this question as it sees fit; but there, if anywhere under the flag, is imperialism. The Constitution, it seems, is not for colored men here; the Constitution is for colored men on the other side of the world.

With some men a colored rebel in the Philippines who is torturing and murdering our boys, is as good or better than any white man, but a colored man in this country who bears the scars of honorable service in fighting for our flag has no political rights which they are bound to respect.

The very men who say that their purpose is to take the negro forever out of politics and bury in the dust the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution are sitting up nights to denounce the Administration for its unconstitutional method of governing Malays and Chinamen in the Philippines without asking the consent of every one of them.

After the treaty of peace was ratified by the assistance of Mr. Bryan, what other course could the Administration pursue than the one it has unfalteringly followed?

When the treaty was ratified there was open rebellion in the Philippines. The Filipinos had inaugurated a war we had sought in every way to avoid. The President's plain constitutional duty was to suppress the insurrection and to restore order, and had he failed to perform his duty every Democratic newspaper in the land would have denounced him and demanded his impeachment.

It is said that we have destroyed the only republic in the East. When was it established? The Filipinos never dreamed of independence until Dewey broke the power of Spain in the Philippines. During the long insurrection under Spanish rule the natives fought for certain reforms, the principal one being the very thing we propose to give them under the provisions of this bill—an opportunity to own their homes by securing and turning over to the people the land now held by the religious orders.

Aguinaldo the founder of a republic? He sought to found not a republic, but an oriential despotism with himself as dictator, and he had General Luna murdered because he thought him a rival and feared his power.

When our trouble with Spain began the insurrection in the Philippines against Spanish authority was over. Aguinaldo and 34 of his principal followers had been bought off by Spain and sent out of the country, and he did not go back to the islands until May 19, eighteen days after the Spanish fleet was destroyed and Manila was at the mercy of Dewey's guns. The war in the Philippines has been conducted on the whole by the American Army in the most humane manner.

Isolated cases of cruelty have occurred. No one defends them, and all such occurrences are being rigorously investigated by the Administration, and all persons shown to be guilty will be punished. It is well to remember, however, that war is not a picnic. War, as General Sherman said, is cruel, and you can not refine it.

Say what you will, the Army has been assailed in this Capitol with coarse and indiscriminate abuse. Gentlemen of the opposition who have made these attacks have apparently heard from the people of this country, and are now endeavoring to convince them they meant to attack the Administration and not the Army. But the record is made and can not be explained away. Even General Chaffee, the hero of San Juan and the campaign in China, has been denounced in this Capitol as "a dastard villain" because he put in force an order promulgated by President Lincoln for the conduct of our armies during the civil war.

If one of our officers dare speak a word in defense of himself or his comrades, a cry of denunciation goes up from this Capitol and a demand that he be muzzled. Since when was it considered brave and manly to gag a man and tie his hands and then rain upon him personal abuse and insult? I do not defend the order of General Smith, and we all regret it, but I never heard it quoted correctly on the other side of the House. There is no pretense that the order called for the killing of women and children. It called alone for the killing of those capable of bearing arms in a certain section filled with murderous guerrillas. It does not appear to have been a written order. Apparently it was merely a verbal order, spoken in a time of great excitement. A barbarous massacre of American soldiers had been committed by a band of treacherous and merciless natives.

Suppose your comrades had been murdered and mutilated by a band of savages worse than red Indians. You would not be likely to weigh your words very carefully or refrain from strong expressions when you spoke of what you would do to punish their murderers if you had the power. Under such circumstances any of us might speak words we should regret afterwards. Suppose General Smith said all that it is alleged he said. Is it not well to inquire what he actually did as bearing upon the question of what he really meant? There is not a scintilla of evidence to show that any woman or child was killed or harmed under that order, nor any man who would not have been killed if the order had never been given.

We know something of the conditions that prevail there. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] traveled all through General Smith's department last year, and I quote from what he said in the House a short time since. Mr. HILL said:

I state that I found the department of Gen. Jacob H. Smith in peace and quietness, and yet while that condition existed this incident actually occurred: A company of Tagalos, Filipinos—the Filipino army, if you choose to call it such—descended upon a village of peaceful Filipinos, who chose to carry on their regular business pursuits in peace and quietness, and destroyed that village, murdering men, women, and children. And if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] desires a specimen of barbarity, I want to tell you what they did to loyal Filipinos and Americans. They took men out and tied them to ant-hills.

Now, that may seem a strange thing, but those ant-hills are 6 or 8 or 10 feet high and 6 feet in diameter, filled with ants that are absolutely ravenous and eat up everything they come in contact with. They tied these men to ant-hills and allowed them to be eaten to death by ants. They buried them in the ground up to their necks and allowed them to be pecked to death by the birds and eaten by the ants. They took loyal Filipinos and loyal Americans and cut them open in the abdomen, taking out a portion of the bowel and nailing it to a tree and driving them around the tree with bolos compelling them to disembowel themselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that throws some light upon the conditions that prevail over there. The severity of an order is to be measured, to some extent, at least, by the existing conditions and the character of the enemy. We do not need to go back beyond the memory of many here or to go beyond the confines of our own country to find orders exceeding in severity the alleged order of General Smith, and orders not merely issued, but executed to the letter.

In 1863 occurred the draft riots in the city of New York. A formidable and murderous mob sought to take possession of that great city. Buildings were sacked and fired, scores of defenseless citizens were cruelly murdered and mutilated, and for a time it seemed as if that murderous mob would overpower the authorities and seize and loot the city. The police force was inadequate and the troops were at the front. When the captains of police, almost despairing of making a successful stand, asked the president of the police board what they should do with their prisoners, he answered, "Do not take any. Kill! Kill! Put down the mob. Do not bring in a prisoner until the mob is put down," and this order was executed. Hundreds of people were shot or clubbed to death in the streets of New York before the mob was crushed and the city saved.

Within a year in this country a company of armed men, charged with the duty of enforcing a police regulation, and meeting with some resistance, shot and killed several men, three women, and one or two children, and yet the newspapers scarcely noticed the occurrence. In one afternoon right here in this country more women and children were shot and killed than have been killed by our Army in the Philippines since the war began, so far as the evidence shows.

A cry of horror goes up because our troops in the Philippines have burned towns, towns sheltering murderous bushwhackers, towns consisting of shacks that could be rebuilt in a few days, and at an expense of three to ten dollars a building. One would think that a building destroyed by fire never before marked the progress of an army. Has the destruction of Chambersburg, Pa., by a Confederate army been so soon forgotten? Against the torrent of abuse directed against the American Army I put the testimony of Governor Taft, who has been all through the islands and spent two years there. He states:

I desire to say that it is my deliberate judgment that there never was a war conducted, whether against inferior races or not, in which there were more compassion and more restraint and more generosity, assuming that there was a war at all, than there has been in the Philippine Islands.

I wish to add to that the statement of Rev. Homer C. Stuntz, the head of the Methodist missions of Manila, a statement which he made in Chicago on May 26. He says:

There have been cruelties on both sides, but cruelties are a mere incident in a war carried on by human beings, not all of whom have obtained entire sanctification. But there has never been more humanity shown than in that very war, and in the hospitals the Filipino wounded are treated just like our own.

It has been said the army first sent to the islands was composed of drunkards. That same drunken army in one and a half years set free 10,000,000 people from ecclesiastical and political slavery which had been endured for four hundred years.

In the name of goodness, I would ask you to have patience with our men in the Philippines. I have all confidence in the world in the Taft Commission. Aguinaldo himself has told me if he had known the American people would do for the Filipinos what they have done nothing could have induced him to fire a gun or lift a finger against them.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic members of Congress at this time have been forced against their will into a peculiar position, and are called upon to vote for some measure which establishes a scheme of government for the Philippine Archipelago. From the beginning they have opposed the conquest of this country and its people. From the beginning they have opposed any attempt to establish sovereignty or governmental control over these islands.

At all times they have recognized those cardinal principles and fundamental doctrines of the Democratic party upon which the American Republic was founded and which were written deep into the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States:

That all men in all countries and among all nations and peoples are created equal and endowed with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

During the whole history of this Republic and up to the present time this has been the paramount principle and the one great slogan under which the Democratic party has fought. The Republican party from its origin until the close of the war with Spain has had written in its platforms and advocated these same great principles, claiming them as Republican principles; and any man that would have controverted this doctrine in the past would have been considered neither a loyal Democrat nor a loyal Republican. After the Spanish war by some great legerdemain when great economic questions were engrossing the attention of the voters of this country a sudden change in the the tenets and policy of the Republican party took place.

They brought to the front a doctrine absolutely at variance with all their former teachings, and first excused and then openly advocated the right and duty of this country to control an inferior race in no way connected with us either by the ties of blood or neighborhood or important commercial relations. This right they maintained directly against the will and wishes of the people over whom they sought to exercise this sovereignty, and who resisted to such an extent that a war of subjugation, lasting from the close of the Spanish war until the present time, was obliged to be maintained at the cost of hundreds of millions of dollars to this country and tens of thousands of the lives of our citizens.

For this great change in the policy of the Republican party they have never given a rational explanation. Nor have they been able to explain to any thinking American how they hoped or expected to obtain any results from it which would be beneficial to the people of the United States. When future students of history read the pages upon which the declarations and acts and all matters of fact which go to make up the history of this period are written, they will find it absolutely impossible to point out a just cause or give a righteous reason upon which it can be explained.

When the United States Government declared war against Spain, the open and avowed purpose, and, I believe at that time, the real and true purpose, was to free the people of Cuba from the tyranny and oppression of Spanish rule. This was in accordance with every declaration and principle which the people of this country had ever maintained. It proved that they not only sympathized with every down-trodden race, but on this occasion were willing by their acts as well as their words to maintain by arms, if need be, that the freedom, liberty, and independence which they enjoyed were alike the heritage of every nation of the earth.

The reason that Cuba was singled out for active assistance was that it lay very close to our shores, and the tyranny and oppression of this people was constantly brought to our ears, until these tales of woe and suffering so affected the American mind and conscience and aroused the sympathy and heart of our people that they became willing to make great sacrifices to help these suffering neighbors. The heart throb of the American people became so strong and distinct that upon a slight pretext war was declared. And lest the slightness of the pretext should be questioned it was broadly announced that the purpose of the war was not for the obtaining of material results, such as the acquiring of territory, treasure, or commercial advantage, but was in response to the dictates of humanity to free an oppressed people, and to confer upon them the inalienable rights of liberty, independence, and self-government.

No one can doubt but that the present leaders of the Republican party now consider the pledge and promise to create for the people of Cuba a free republic was a mistake; and if in the transaction they could have started at the beginning no such declaration would have been made, but the United States, after destroying the power of Spain in Cuba, would have annexed it against the wishes of the people.

Porto Rico, to whose inhabitants no promise had been made, was promptly annexed without question and explanation, as were the people and the islands of the Philippine Archipelago. No thinking American can doubt but that if at the time war with Spain was declared the Congress of the United States had dreamed that war against Spain would have been carried into the Philippine Islands, a broad, explicit, and open declaration and pledge similar to that made to the people of Cuba would have been made to the people of the Philippines.

Both Cuba and the Philippine Islands in the decade preceding the war with Spain were in the same situation. Spanish oppression and tyranny had brought on a general revolution in both countries. War was waged by the inhabitants against the mother country. Large amounts of treasure and thousands of lives had been sacrificed, and a universal demand for independence and the right of self-government was made by both peoples alike.

While Cuba was still in open revolt the revolution in the Philippines had been temporarily subdued, and the people were awaiting a favorable opportunity to again begin the struggle for liberty. If the positive declaration to Cuba was sincere it carried with it an implied declaration of a similar character to the people of the Philippine Islands. And it is no wonder that both Admiral Dewey and General Otis in their dealings with Aguinaldo and his followers fully believed that the same policy would be followed in our dealings with the people of the Philippines as was promised in dealing with the people of Cuba.

This was an inference any American citizen who believed in the sincerity of the declaration of this country was forced to draw, and it was a duty to act upon the lines it indicated, because to do anything else would have been to brand the declaration of the purpose of the war as a lie of the blackest character. And neither of these officers can be rightfully charged with being false or indiscreet in anything they said or did without instruction in their dealings with the revolutionary forces in the Philippines.

When we take into consideration the actual circumstances and the relative positions occupied by the people of Cuba and the people of the Philippines to the people of this country, no one can deny but that the equities which would have required the establishment of a republic in the Philippines were far greater than those dictating the establishment of a republic in Cuba.

While it was a matter of sympathy and humanity that led us to declare war against Spain and free Cuba, the people of the Philippines had become our friends and allies and materially assisted us in bringing the war with Spain to a successful conclusion. It is a matter of fact beyond controversy that almost immediately after Aguinaldo and his 17 followers brought by the United States vessel McCulloch from Hongkong to Cavite, Luzon, on the 19th day of May, 1898, landed, he assembled and rallied around his banner the native inhabitants of Luzon and the Visayan group and carried on military operations against the Spanish forces in those islands with such success that he had killed or taken prisoner all the Spanish troops located outside the city of Manila.

He had wrested from Spanish control the country outside that city and had confined her army to that place and its immediate environments, so that the subjugation of the Spaniards in the Philippines by our land forces when they arrived, without the loss of a life, was a matter of easiest accomplishment. That this, together with the success of our arms in Cuba and the destruction of the Spanish fleets, brought an end to the war and victory to our arms can not be doubted. It was, I am satisfied, as matters stood before the terms of the treaty of peace had been agreed to and before the American troops came into any clash with the troops of the native people, our plain and bounden duty to have declared to the people of those islands that the United States would accord to them their independence on terms and conditions, if not more favorable, equally as favorable as the terms and conditions which would be granted to the people of Cuba.

Did any change occur up to the time the United States turned its arms against their new-found allies and proceeded to forcibly reduce to subjection these people? For a long time it was contended that the war with the Filipinos was begun by them. But when the true facts gradually came to light it is now known by all that the troops of the United States fired the first shot which brought on this war and that after this first unfortunate occurrence the leaders of the Philippine army notified the United States military authorities that at no time and in no way did they sanction these acts of hostility, and asked that orders should be given by which a stop would be put to them promptly. And it was only after the declaration made by our representative that now that hostilities had begun they would continue until the insurgent forces would lay down their arms and unconditionally submit to the control and sovereignty of the United States did the real war begin.

At this time, if a promise had been made to the Filipino leaders that independence and self-government would be given to their people, peace and order and quiet would have been an immediate result. It must not be forgotten that during that whole period of time from May until after the signing of the treaty of peace in December and up to the 4th of February, when the first shots were fired at Santa Mesa, Aguinaldo and his people had maintained a substantial government throughout the whole country.

Under his control were included not only Luzon, but all that portion of the Philippine Archipelago except those islands inhabited by the Moro people. During all this period of time the civil and military government of Aguinaldo went hand in hand, and as soon as it became known that the treaty of peace had been signed in many parts of the island of Luzon the military authorities promptly withdrew from all exercise of control and made place for and assisted in the establishment of the civil government. At this time even the people of the Philippine Islands never doubted but that independence would be granted them, subject, perhaps, to American protection. Nothing in the history and events which led up to the war with the Filipinos can be properly urged showing that any blame for hostilities can be charged to the people of those islands.

The plea that this was done because the Filipinos were unable to maintain a substantial government there was an afterthought and a pretext founded upon an absolute falsehood. No unprejudiced person can deny that under all these circumstances the very least that the United States could have done was to allow these people to go on with and perfect their government, so that the fact could have been determined whether they were or were not able to govern themselves.

Had this been done, our national honor and integrity would have been maintained and our flag remained the emblem of virtue, liberty, and independence and the symbol of patriotism, humanity, and freedom. Every principle enunciated by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States would have been upheld and maintained and every basic principle of the Democratic and Republican parties would have been reiterated by such action.

But this was not to be. For a long time the Republican leaders who exercised almost absolute control over the then President of the United States thought they saw a grand opportunity to add a rich territory to the possessions of this country—a territory which had not been exploited and which, if an opportunity were given them to exploit it, under such government that the United States might set up there, would yield them great fortunes.

The fact that there would be much glory derived from a large territory being added to this country under the Presidency of William McKinley seems to have made an otherwise just and conservative President, without counting the cost, plunge the country into another war more costly in both lives and money than the war with Spain which had just been successfully closed. I do not think at this late day it can be successfully contended that for some time previous to the actual beginning of hostilities the United States had not been actively preparing to pursue the policy it afterwards followed. It was well known that the Philippine people were unanimous in one desire, and that was to start up a government of their own. It was also known that this government was intended to be republican in form.

The Philippine congress had been sitting for a considerable time at Malolos, and as early as September 29 General Aguinaldo made a speech to that congress the keynote of which was "independence." On December 26 this congress adjourned, and a few days afterwards a new Philippine cabinet was formed, all of its members pledged to independence. The president of the congress and minister of foreign affairs was Señor Mabini; secretary of war, Señor Luna; interior, Señor Araveta; agriculture and commerce, Señor Buencamino; public works, Señor Canon.

On the 21st of January, 1899, the Philippine constitution was proclaimed at Malolos. A careful examination of this document shows that practically it was a counterpart of the Constitution of the United States, and no one who reads it can deny that it is an able state paper, and if followed, as it was intended to be, would have furnished the Philippine people a substantial republican government on American lines.

Right here let me again say that no reason existed at this time for anyone to doubt that the Philippine people were not able to maintain the government they had planned. From the time Aguinaldo began his operations after landing he had maintained throughout the whole of Luzon, as well as throughout all the large islands inhabited by the Christian part of the Philippine people, a military government, and, in addition to that, a substantial civil government, and the people were only waiting for the treaty to be signed and their independence to be recognized when the military government was to be withdrawn and the sole governmental control of the islands was to pass into the hands of the civil government.

In fact, Wilcox and Sergeant, in their report through Admiral Dewey to the United States Government, which information was in the hands of the United States Government long before the war with the Filipinos began, and which information Admiral Dewey certified as being correct, made the following statements:

APARRI.

Aparri, with a population of 20,000, has many handsome houses. News had been received from Hongkong papers that the Senators of the United States favored the independence of the islands, with an American protectorate. Colonel Tirano considered the information sufficiently reliable to justify him in regarding Philippine independence assured and warfare in the island at an end.

He proceeded to relinquish the military command he held over the provinces and to place this power in the hands of a civil officer elected by the people. On the day following our arrival the ceremony occurred which solemnizes the transfer of authority in the province of Cagayan.

The presidentes locales of all the towns in the province were present at the ceremony. The elected officer, called Jefe Provincial, thanked the disciplined military forces and their colonel for the service rendered the province and assured them that the work they had begun would be perpetuated by the people, when every man, woman, and child stood ready to take up arms and defend their newly won liberty and resist with the last drop of blood the attempt of any nation whatever to bring them back to their former state of dependence.

He was followed by the three officers who constituted the provincial government, the heads of the three departments of justice, police, and internal revenue. Every town in this province has the same organization.

It is amazing to see how well these natives can read and write when their limited opportunities for learning are considered. Large numbers of them have at one time or other been attached to some official post, so that when their oppressors were overthrown they were prepared to supplant them in office, and in many instances they conducted the affairs of state with a greater degree of efficiency than was displayed by their Spanish predecessors.

At this time the United States had not yet announced its policy with regard to the Philippines. The treaty of peace was being negotiated. In the meantime the native population, taking matters into their own hands, had declared their independence from all foreign jurisdiction and had set up a provisional government with Aguinaldo at its head.

It can not be denied that in a region occupied by many millions of inhabitants for nearly six months it stood alone between anarchy and order.

The Philippine officers, both military and civil, that we met in all the provinces, with very few exceptions, were men of intelligent appearance and conversation. The same is true of all those men who form the upper class in each town. They have great respect and admiration for learning, and many men of importance told me the first use the public revenues would be put to after the danger from war was over was to start good schools in every village. The poorer class are ignorant on most subjects, but a large percentage of them can read and write. In the provinces of eastern Luzon which we visited there appears to be no friction between the civil and military.

As to the question of independence at that time among the civil and military officers and the leading townspeople, the desire was universal. "On one point they seemed united, viz, that whatever our Government did for them it had gained no right to annex them."

It also must not be forgotten that as early as June 27, 1898, Admiral Dewey, in his dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy, said:

In my opinion these people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races.

So that, at a time previous to the beginning of the Philippine war, the United States had Admiral Dewey's opinion, Wilcox and Sergeant's report, the knowledge that a Philippine congress had been held and adjourned and a government organized, and the knowledge that a constitution had been adopted on the lines of the Constitution of this country, as well as the knowledge that from the latter part of May, 1898, until February, 1899, a period of eight months, the Philippine people had maintained a potential and substantial government over a large part of the archipelago, and had arranged, as soon as the treaty of peace was signed and independence granted them even under an American protectorate, for a continuance of this government.

Up to that time no evidence had been adduced which showed or tended to show that the Philippine people were not able to maintain a responsible government in the islands. These facts, to my mind, are convincing that the pretext that the reason the United States began, in February, 1899, to put into force a policy looking toward the subjugation of the Philippine people because they were not able to govern themselves was trumped up to suit the policy followed and was but an afterthought.

As soon as it became known that neither independence was to be granted to the Philippine people nor was the United States willing to make any declaration looking to ultimate independence, but that it would deal with Philippine people only upon terms of absolute and unconditional surrender, not only of the country but of the very arms they held, it can not be wondered that the outbreak took place and war followed.

I think no honest American will deny that if the Filipinos had surrendered at that time and acceded to the demands of the United States, they would by such action have proved that they were not worthy of the liberty and independence which they craved. And subsequent events convince me, as much as anything I have learned about these people, that the tenacity with which they maintained this war under most adverse conditions and the sacrifices they made to secure their independence and self-government showed they were worthy of it and were able to maintain their own government if an opportunity had been given them.

The policy pursued by the United States in the Philippine Islands is almost a parallel with that pursued by Great Britain in her war in South Africa. At a present cost of over $200,000,000 and of 10,000 lives of American citizens, and a future cost which will run to nearly or quite a billion of dollars, when pensions which must and should be paid are considered, this country has obtained a sovereignty over 10,000,000 people of the brown race who are not now fitted to become American citizens, nor with advantage to us can they ever be granted such citizenship.

They have obtained sovereignty over a large archipelago situated so far from their shores that these possessions are bound to be a menace to this country should they ever engage in wars with any great power of the world. They are in control of a country from which the commercial advantages, exaggerated as they have been, will be trifling and will and can be enjoyed on the same terms by any other commercial nation of the world.

They have also obtained a country which some short-sighted and foolish people maintain will be a place of vantage in developing the Chinese Empire. These people have never stopped to think that it will be to the greatest advantage of the people of the United States to leave China sleep and enjoy the lethargy into which she has fallen. But a few days spent in China, with a knowledge of the Chinese people and their country, which I have been able to obtain, I am satisfied that with the awakening of China, with the change of our present policy, the United States will find a competitor in the markets of the world with which it will be impossible to compete and at the same time maintain the economic condition enjoyed by the people of the United States to-day.

The establishment of manufactures in the Philippines, if possible, means competition with the products of the laboring classes of the States, so that the possession of this supposed vantage ground will only lead to our undoing. All that I believe we can obtain from the Philippines that will be of lasting benefit to us will be coaling and naval stations, perhaps a return of some of the money which has been spent there, and commercial treaty stipulations which may to some extent increase our future commerce with that country.

This will best be brought about by the introduction and general adoption of the English language by the natives.

With great interest and greater surprise I listened to the "stop thief" speech with which the chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee opened the debate on this bill. He may take his statement seriously, but the country can not. If appropriately cartooned, the picture he presented would be that of a giant clubbing unmercifully a very small brown boy, and with every blow telling him how he loves him, how tenderly and kindly he would be treated in the future, and how he would be granted liberty and independence under a despotic rule in which he was given no substantial control.

Is is not rather late in the day for the Republican Administration to ask these people to believe that, under a benign dispensation of Providence, they and their country fell into the hands of the United States so that liberty, independence, and all the beautiful privileges of the people of the United States might be thrust upon them against their will? The theory that after all this horrid bloodshed and all the cruelty practiced by and in the name of the United States that country is to carry on a great foreign missionary enterprise in this archipelago is so grotesque that it neither appeals to one's reason nor imagination.

It is a very cheap argument, although I am aware that it has been adopted as a stock one by the Republican party, "that the Philippine people do not even know what liberty and independence mean."

I have no doubt this was said of the American colonists when they talked liberty, independence, and self-government to England, and I have no doubt it is fair to say that as large a percentage of the people in the Philippines to-day know what these great words mean as understood their full import in America at the time of the Revolutionary struggle.

This country may thank its stars that it did not find arrayed against it the kind of fighting men John Bull found in South Africa. For had it, there would have been a very different tale to tell. And I say to my friend from Wisconsin that I believe, despite the great eulogy he pronounced on that great American statesman, Abraham Lincoln, that were he living to-day he would be opposing the policy which the Republican party have been following in the Philippines and stand shoulder to shoulder in this opposition with President Harrison and Speaker Reed and many another of the former leaders of the Republican party. He must recognize the fact that not only many leaders but the rank and file of the Republican voters to-day are convinced that the war with the Filipinos was a blunder if it was not a crime.

The speech of the chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee is a plea for atonement. His speech had the ring of sincerity about it. As far as he is concerned personally, I believe he would do everything that his party would permit him to do to atone for the great wrongs we have done these people. And I say to him here that from what I know of the Philippine people I believe to-day, as at the beginning of the Philippine war, the greatest benefit that can be conferred upon them is an unequivocal declaration that the United States will grant them absolute independence and self-government and allow them, for they have the capacity, to become an important and leading nation of the Orient.

I see no such promise written in the bill presented by the Republicans of the House. I see no such promise written in the bill which was passed by the Republican party in the Senate. I have heard of no demand being made by the President during the time he has been the Chief Executive of this nation. He has made demands for Cuban reciprocity and demands on many other subjects, but never has he demanded independence for the Philippine people. Write this promise into your law, and the Philippine problem is solved; leave it out, and the struggle goes on for years. And the time will come, after all this foolish waste of time and money and effort and life, that you will write it into your law and thus solve the problem.

To me the details of your bill are but trifles. Every time that you put a Filipino into a governmental place, every time that you permit a Filipino to participate in the government of his country, you necessarily recognize his ability to maintain a government.

More lies have been told about the Filipinos since the American occupation than about any other nation on the face of the earth, the Boers alone excepted. First they were savages, then they were ignorant, then they were treacherous, liars, thieves, and murderers.

To the American Army they were rarely ever known except by the term "damned" niggers, and still when the Taft Commission undertook to erect a civil government there under the protection of a force of 75,000 bold, brave, well-armed American soldiers, they have always been able to find a Filipino educated and capable of filling any place at their disposal, from chief justice of the supreme court to policeman. Although much could have been said, little has been said creditable to these people. It always seems strange to me how it was possible for people to ever get the idea that the 8,000,000 Christians living there were savages. It always seemed incredible to me that any man could be so imposed upon as to believe that these people were unfitted to maintain a government.

When I stop to ask myself the question, what were the real reasons which brought on the frequent and almost constant struggles against Spanish rule—struggles which at times reached a position of general insurrection, which were suppressed only after long and bloody struggles, for in one of these, that of 1896, 30,000 Filipinos were slain—the invariable answer is, that these people demanded governmental reforms from Spain, not only general governmental reforms, but particular reforms, and were willing to make almost any sacrifice to secure them.

Surely this proves, any statement to the contrary, that these people recognized what the duty of the Spanish Government was to them, and were alive to the fact that these duties were not performed. If we had no other facts to judge but the history of their struggles with Spain for a good government, these alone would convince the unprejudiced of their appreciation of what a good government was and their ability to maintain one.

I am not one of those who condemn the administration of Governor Taft and his associates in the Philippines. No better man could have been selected for this difficult task. He has accomplished much there under the most trying circumstances. The military rule which preceded his administration had established a reign of terrorism. The natives, thoroughly despised by the military authorities, had been dealt with most cruelly. Among the natives chaos reigned in almost every part of the islands under military control, even in Manila.

The only exceptions were those districts where able, level-headed, humane military commanders were in authority. The province of the Cammarines was one of these exceptions. Taft promptly accomplished the task of mitigating the severity of military rule, and it must be said to the praise of his administration that he promptly brought order out of chaos and assured such of the native people as he came in contact with that he would do everything in his power to mitigate their condition and establish law and order and justice in the country. He stood as a firm bulwark against the military, and I am satisfied his policy did more to create the improved condition of affairs now existing there than the strenuous policy pursued by the Army.

Against their advice and prediction that his policy would lead to a continuation and extension of armed opposition to the United States authorities, he took the natives into his confidence and promptly intrusted the more capable and better educated to important and unimportant positions under the civil government. He instituted the policy of maintaining order by the establishment of a native police force against the advice and protest of many of the officers of the American Army.

While I am in no position to indorse all that he and his associates have done there, I am satisfied that the policy he has pursued has been a beneficial one. The government he has instituted is an expensive one, and will be more expensive the longer it is continued on the lines he has laid out; as long as Americans are continued in control of many of the principal offices at American salaries; as long as large sums of money are spent in the construction of roads, railroads, cold-storage plants, and the establishment of schools, and supplying the people with needed educational facilities, such as teachers, books, and the like, and in improving the harbors, it will be necessary to raise by taxation very large amounts of money.

These taxes are bound to become a great burden upon the people. As long as the United States maintains a large number of soldiers there who spend their earnings in the communities where they are located and in other ways this Government brings into the country and spends among the people a large amount of American money these taxes may not be a heavy burden upon the people, but with the withdrawal of the United States armies and the discontinuance of the large expenditures heretofore made by this country the burdens must fall upon the people and the productions of the country more directly. They will have to come from a large increase in the staple productions, such as hemp, rice, sugar, tobacco, and cocoanuts, which are the chief commercial products in sight, or from the savings of the people, if there are any, or from the introduction of foreign capital.

I believe the Commission is altogether too hasty in pressing these improvements. Many of the anticipated expenditures of money should be delayed until it is accurately ascertained what the resources actually are under natural conditions. Governor Taft may be excused in his effort to organize and maintain an ideal government there. This he can do only as long as he has the power of an absolute sovereign, for I think it may be considered an axiom in government that the character of government maintained will never be superior to the people who exercise it and who are controlled by it. Superior governments imposed upon inferior people never have been permanent. This is especially so in governments republican in their form. All such governments which have been stable or even lasted for any length of time have undergone the developing process, and this development has been brought about by the growth of the people they control.

For this reason I feel satisfied that the best and most stable government that can be erected in the Philippine Islands must begin with an organization simple in its form and structure and suitable to the wants, needs, and enlightenment of the masses of the people it is intended to control. I do not believe that it is the duty nor the right policy of this country to continue any longer than necessary their governmental policy in this archipelago. Considered as a duty, it is a self-imposed one. Considered as a benefit, it will be only temporarily beneficial to the Filipinos; and as far as the people of the United States are concerned, instead of a benefit it will always be a burden from which only the most vivid imagination can picture any compensating advantage.

Let us glance into the future and anticipate the situation as it will develop under natural circumstances, and following the rational and reasonable, not the speculative and irrational. What can we expect will happen by the pursuit of our present policy there?

First, we will go on with improvements made by burdensome taxes levied or by the expenditure of borrowed capital, upon which interest must be immediately paid and ultimately the principal.

Whenever you run a country into debt and tax its resources unduly, business will be paralyzed and discontent manifest itself among the masses of the people.

Many of the improvements will not pay and produce benefits commensurate with the expense entailed. The income will decrease, expenses and debts increase; what then? Why should we undertake this gigantic speculation?

Little by little the power of the government will go into the hands of the people, unless we continue permanently a government on the lines of that of an English crown colony, or a despotism.

The better educated and more able these people become the firmer they will be welded together and united in resisting our control. The Philippines for the Filipinos will be their motto, and their line of action will be in accordance with this idea. Much which we have sought to do under the idea it would be beneficial they will undo. Often our policies will be resisted, perhaps for no other reason than the proposition comes from us.

These people will always remain strangers and foreigners to us. We can not make them white. We can not make them like our citizens. Their blood will not and should not mix with ours, and if it did the product would not produce any improvement. They will never forget the cruelty and bloodshed through which they were brought into subjection. In their minds we will always be murderers and tyrants, and this will be the cry used by their popular leaders whenever our ideas and interests come into collision with theirs.

I am satisfied the more intelligent of the Filipinos have taken into consideration all these probabilities, and this is the real cause of most of them submitting to our authority and present control.

They well know we can not people these islands with our citizens or menace their integrity as a people and a nation. They know that all we can do will bring them closer together, and that the time is not far distant when they will control the situation, and they are patiently awaiting that day. Nothing we can do will drive away their aspirations for independence and self-government.

They may not come into open revolt against our authority in the near future, and then again they may, should a good opportunity present itself. They will be always giving us trouble and causing us alarm. This situation we can naturally expect with the real Filipino.

A much worse condition of affairs must be expected whenever we undertake to stir up and interfere with the Moros. As long as our sovereignty is merely nominal and they are left alone to practice their cherished customs of polygamy and slavery and the despotic control of their chieftains in their exercise of life and death, without trial, over their subjects, especially if we pay them a considerable annual bribe for nominal dominion, they will keep on without paying any particular attention to us. But let us once interfere with their religion and customs and practices and government, then we can expect another war of conquest, and with them it will be a cruel war and one only solved by their extermination. We have in them 2,500,000 American Indians to deal with.

What other alternative have we? Only one—making them American citizens.

So far as the Moros are concerned, no one who has ever seen them at home would ever dream of taking such a step.

What Republican statesman or politician can show how this country would be benefited by adding to our citizens 8,000,000 Tagal people? They do not want our citizenship, for they are not willing to become a tail to our kite. It certainly is a serious proposition to increase our population by the addition of one-tenth our present numbers, and that tenth able to be still further strengthened by rapid increase under favorable conditions. With equal representation they will hold the balance of power in our lawmaking bodies. And all this for what gain?

I appreciate the fact that our policy has been carried on in the Philippines to such an extent that conditions prevail which are not at all natural there, and the immediate withdrawal of our Government would in all probability create confusion. But I think steps should be taken preparatory to our rapid withdrawal as soon as the circumstances permit.

This time will be greatly shortened by declaring to the Filipinos just what our future policy will be to them. We have reached the time when it is no longer fair or decent to equivocate. If we are going to allow them to establish their own government when they prove themselves able to maintain a stable one, let us say so directly, in plain, unambiguous language. If we are never going to give them their freedom and independence, but rule them as a subject nation, let us make that declaration in plain terms. If we propose in the future to annex their country and give them the rights of American citizens, including the right to participate in our Government according to their numbers, let us frankly make this declaration. We have sufficient information at the present time before us to accurately judge of their possibilities as well as their probabilities.

The policy we are pursuing, refusing to make any direct declaration, is a cowardly one. And we are continuing to grope in the dark, when the doors can be opened and our pathway illumined. By this legislation it is possible to settle the question for the present at least. If this legislation indicates that independence and self-government will be granted these people, it will be settled permanently. There is no virtue in the contention that independence under any conditions, if promised them now, will interfere with the progress of the Commission in their scheme of government. On the contrary, in all matters which seem to bring direct benefits to these people every assistance will be promptly rendered to the present civil government. Every effort will be made by the people to show that they are able to maintain a stable government of their own, and instead of the time for granting independence to them being delayed it will be materially hastened.

According to Governor Taft, it may take generations until these people be brought to the plane he conceives it possible to advance them under the benign influences of our patronizing paternal Government. I have no doubt that every pretext will be used to lengthen this time as long as present profits and the expectation of greater advantages and benefits in the future are held out to those Americans into whose hands the management of the Government will be intrusted. It is but human nature to try to hold on to a good thing, especially when that is a well-paid office.

While I do not believe mercenary ideas govern the desire of Mr. Taft and all his associates to continue control over these islands, I have no doubt there are even members of the Commission who would find it difficult to obtain the same pecuniary advantages they now enjoy were they returned to this country.

I am satisfied there are many Americans in the public service whose employment there is of great pecuniary advantage to them. It is a very fine position to hold which enables its possessor to exercise autocratic power, levy taxes, make laws, execute laws, and fix his own salary and that of his associates, relatives, and friends.

Should this government continue for a generation or more, what guaranties have this country and the Philippine people that it will not be ruled by men having entirely different aims and entirely different ideas of public proprieties and duties than those I believe to be entertained by Governor Taft?

We have seen peculation and dishonesty confront us in the management of public affairs in this country; we have seen the same in our management of the affairs of Cuba during the short time it was being prepared to assume independent control of the new Republic. The Philippines are very much farther off, the temptations very much greater, and it is but natural for us to expect that should we continue control of these possessions scandals on a large scale must be expected.

Have we not sufficient tangled problems to cope with in the growth and industrial development of our own people? Can we afford to turn our attention to the control, development, and education of alien foreign races for the mere satisfaction and pleasure of showing our ability to rule? Patriotic charity begins at home, and a wise course it is to continue the old policy of avoiding all entangling alliances, especially with inferior people.

Who denies that the title of American citizen is a much prouder one than that of British subject? I hope the day is far distant when we shall coin the new title of American subject.

Let us give the Filipino a chance. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CURRIER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GAINES of West Virginia reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill S. 2295, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 10, 11, 22, 35, 41, 44, 48, 49, 59, 60, 63, 65, 66, 67, 69, and 78.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 28, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 42, 45, 51, 53, 54, 55, 62, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 79, 80, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, and 90; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Including the purchase of necessary land, $640,000: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers of the Government, all expenditures heretofore made for land purchased for use as naval coal depots;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out insert the following: "One clerk in charge of distribution of books at $1,200;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert the following: "$31,402.52;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "To complete building numbered 19, $60,000; extension to dispensary building, $1,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Condemnation of land adjacent to the Norfolk Navy-Yard: The Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to cause to be commenced, within three months after the passage of this act, proceedings for the condemnation of the following tract of land, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary, for the use of the United States for the Norfolk Navy-Yard, and for other naval purposes, namely, the tract of land known as the Schmolles property, containing some 272.4 acres, more or less, in Norfolk County, Va., and adjacent to the Norfolk Navy-Yard, under the act of Congress approved August 1, 1888, entitled 'An act to authorize the condemnation of lands for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes,' and other laws of the United States, so as to completely vest in the United States the title of said land; and all such proceedings shall be reported to Congress at its next session by the Secretary of the Navy."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "to complete purchase of land heretofore condemned and partially appropriated for, $25,950;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Publication of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac: Hereafter there shall be published of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac 2,500 copies, 500 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for distribution or sale by the Navy Department."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 82, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

On page 64 strike out lines 5, 6, and 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "In all, pay Marine Corps, $1,831,129.23;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 1, 7, 9, 13, 24, 25, 26, 37, 38, 39, 40, 43, 46, 47, 52, 56, 57, 58, 61, 64, 76, 77, 88, 89, 91, 92, and 93 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
ALSTON G. DAYTON,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate still further insist upon the amendments not agreed to and ask for a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference, and Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN were appointed.

AGREEMENT WITH CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4284) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,' approved January 14, 1889;" which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute:

Mr. QUARLES. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees, and Mr. QUARLES, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. By request I present a memorial of representative citizens of the Indian Territory, of both political parties, relative to the election of a Delegate to Congress from that Territory. I move that the memorial and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I present a paper, being the memorial of S. W. Peel, relative to certain claims of the loyal Creek Indians. I move that the paper be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE presented petitions of the boards of trade of the State of Maine and of the Board of Trade of Bangor, Me., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States;" which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the city council of Chicago, Ill., praying that an appropriation be made providing for an exposition in that city in aid of a home for aged and infirm colored persons; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the petition of Robert Schafges and sundry other citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that an investigation be made concerning religious injustice in the Philippine Islands; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have a communication from the Secretary of War inclosing a copy of a report from Gen. George W. Davis, now in the Philippines, in regard to the general staff bill of the Army, which is before the Committee on Military Affairs, and requesting that it be printed in connection with the testimony of the Secretary of War, of General Miles, and of General Schofield taken before the committee on that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none, and the order to print is made.

THE PHILIPPINE SITUATION.

Mr. KEAN. I present a paper, being testimony and statements of witnesses, American and foreign, concerning the conduct of the Army, reconcentration, etc., in the Philippine Islands. I move that the paper be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

SHIP SUBSIDIES.

Mr. CLAY. I hold in my hand two communications relating to ship subsidies that I regard of great value. They are couched in parliamentary and respectful language. I ask that each of them be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the papers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUBSIDIES THE CLIMAX OF THE PROTECTIVE SUPERSTITION.

[By Louis F. Post, editor of the Public.]

At the risk of being suspected as a Greek bearing gifts, I should like to ask protectionists—those who believe in protectionism upon principle, of course, and not the trusts that seek protection merely for their own interests and whose members greedily appropriate its benefits to their own private use—to consider very thoughtfully the probable effect of ship subsidies upon the popularity of their cherished doctrine.

Subsidies are unquestionably in line with the protective idea, for they are one of the modes of "encouraging domestic industry" by means of taxation. But they are altogether too candidly direct in method and too recklessly transparent in purpose. The masses of the people may feel their burdens, even under our indirect system of taxation, and are certain to recognize their plundering character. Is it wise, then, for sincerely philanthropic and patriotic protectionists to risk the possibilities of exposure of the essential nature of protection to which this all too candid mode of application will subject it?

For my part, I am quite willing to concede the superiority, for the purpose of protection to home industry, of subsidies paid directly out of the public Treasury over subsidies paid by consumers of domestic goods indirectly to the beneficiaries under compulsion of protective tariffs. The direct subsidy is better for many reasons.

In the first place, it is open and above board. Everybody can know who gets it, and how much he gets. Everybody can know, also, whether those who do get it divide up fairly with their workingmen, according to the true intent of the law. Of the indirect or protective tariff subsidies, that is not true. The beneficiaries can, and in practice actually do, conceal their plunder. It comes from so many individual sources, and in ways so various and complicated, that no one can keep track of it except the beneficiaries themselves. In consequence their workingmen are systematically robbed of the share which protective laws design that they should receive.

The only resource of workingmen is to strike when they suspect an unfair division, and that is very unsatisfactory all around. In this respect alone the direct subsidy has marked advantages over the protective tariff subsidy.

Another of its relative advantages is its effect upon the public at large.

The object of both methods is to encourage domestic production. In this respect the tariff method operates with great and harassing awkwardness. In order to encourage the production of woolen goods, for instance, obstructions are put in the way of the importation of foreign woolens. Those that are imported commercially are subjected to import taxes, which increase the price not only to the amount of the tax, but also to the amount of several commercial profits upon the tax, while those that are imported by travelers cause their owners no end of annoyance, to say nothing of the expense, when they land at a home port.

All this extra cost and annoyance must be submitted to until the domestic product has been brought up to the standard of the competing foreign article. Nor does the burden fall off then. For when the domestic product reaches the foreign standard of quality and price, its protected manufacturers insist upon having the protective tariff continued, to enable them to "invade" foreign markets in the name of American enterprise, this invasion consisting in selling their goods at free-trade prices abroad, while maintaining protection prices at home.

And that is not all. Sheep raisers clamor for protective tariffs on wool, to enable them to force their product upon the domestic woolen manufacturers, who force their product upon tailors. And tailors clamor for protective tariffs upon clothing to enable them to recoup the extra price they have to pay for cloth.

Protective tariffs are thus piled up all along the line, from the item of the growers of the raw materials to that of the last touch upon the finished product. For what? Simply to build up an infant industry, and to enable it to invade foreign markets after it has been built up. Is a more wasteful method conceivable? Compare that expensive and harassing process of indirect subsidies with the direct subsidy and note how indescribably superior the latter is.

Under the direct subsidy nobody would be annoyed by custom-house officers while the infant industry was growing to maturity. The disadvantages under which the American producer labored being overcome by subsidies paid out of the public Treasury, his goods would enter the domestic market at lower prices than the foreign goods.

Consequently, foreign goods would stay out, except to the extent that the domestic producer was unable fully to meet the home demand, which would be only in the infantile years of his industry. During that period he would be encouraged by having as much of the home market secured to him as he could supply; while home consumers would not be pestered with custom-house regulations in order to procure from abroad what he could not supply, nor burdened with excessive prices for either the foreign or the domestic article. And, although the American people would have to pay the direct subsidy, they would not also have to pay interest upon it every time the subsidized goods changed hands in trade, as they must under a protective tariff.

The same advantageous difference would continue after the domestic goods had been brought to the level of the foreign standard, and the home market could be fully supplied. They could then be sold at home at a price low enough to keep out the foreign article, and, thanks to the subsidy, would also be sent abroad to undersell foreign goods in their own market.

Other reasons might be urged were space abundant. But enough has been said to show the superiority of the direct subsidy system. Whether for the purpose of building up an infant industry at home, or of enabling it to invade foreign markets after it is built up, indirect subsidies through protective tariffs are vastly inferior to direct subsidies paid out of the public Treasury.

But the direct subsidy has also great disadvantages. It is simple. It is easily understood. It is manifestly for the benefit of special interests, and not for the general good. And, withal, it is certain, if overdone—a fate which attends upon all protective methods—to end speedily in an outburst of indignant ridicule. These do not sound like disadvantages, and, so far as the public is concerned, they are not. But they are serious disadvantages from the protection point of view. Such a method of encouraging domestic industry might, if once it were adopted, everlastingly discredit the whole protection theory. That is reason enough for the shyness which shrewd protectionists have heretofore exhibited toward direct subsidies for industrial encouragement.

Lately, however, the fat and greedy beneficiaries of protective tariffs, finding no longer any profit for themselves in that method of taxing Peter to enrich Paul, have been turning with favor toward the direct subsidy system. The first step, the sugar bounty, was not encouraging. It was a mistake to begin with a product like sugar. The purely private nature of this bounty was too obvious. For a beginning, shipping bounties are better. The people know but little about the modern shipping business, and they are ambitious to boast of a great mercantile navy. Subsidies for ships, therefore, do not seem so much as bounties on sugar like private gifts, even if the chief benficiaries of the subsidies are to be the great trust magnates of the country.

But if the system of subsidies once takes root in shipping bounties, is anyone so fatuous as to believe that it will end there? Let the protective tariff system answer. Its multitudinous ramifications and the horde of beggars in all kinds of industrial exploitation clamoring for its favors abundantly testify that there is no limit to public gifts for private benefit short of the will and ability of the giver.

Let shipowners be subsidized out of the public Treasury, and a cry for similar direct subsidies will go up from every industry that can not make the direct subsidies of the protective tariff serve it. If ships, why not exports? European nations, now cited as examples of ship subsidizers, do subsidize some exports with a view to the commercial invasion of other countries.

Shall we shrink from equipping our exporters for that kind of warfare? It has been seen how one tariff breeds another. Why shall not one subsidy breed another? There is no reason for confining subsidies to the encouragement of international trade. If it is good public policy to subsidize ships for foreign commerce it must be good public policy to subsidize ships and railroads for domestic commerce. If it is good public policy to subsidize commodities for export it must be good public policy to subsidize commodities for home consumption. Does anyone doubt, at any rate, that these extensions of subsidies can be urged as plausibly as the ship subsidy, on grounds of public policy? If, for example, a protective tariff on wool for the protection of American sheep could be made an issue in national politics, why not a subsidy on wool, now that the protective tariff fails to protect it?

Protectionists who believe that protection is a legitimate public policy should make no mistake about the ship-subsidy question. With ship subsidies for a starting point and precedent there will be no end to the objects vociferously seeking subsidies and no conceivable end to those getting them. But long before the possible end is reached the whole thing will strike the American sense of humor as unspeakably ridiculous, and the subsidy system, with the protective system, of which it is part, will collapse.

Since that is a consummation which free traders devoutly wish for, they might be quizzically asked why they object to this protection-destroying system of subsidies. It might be urged that the ship subsidy should be welcomed by them as an ally. But free traders are not playing in a game. They are not opposing protection for sport. They oppose it because, whatever may be the mode of application, it is in practice destructive to wholesome industry and in principle economically false and morally pernicious.

The subsidy movement is the normal culmination of a long era of protection by tariffs. In that era a few gigantic trusts, promoted and buttressed if not caused by protection, have developed. They hold the fate of legitimate industry almost at their mercy, and threaten even the political integrity of the Republic. They have perverted the intellectual standard of schools and colleges. They have polluted the moral atmosphere of churches. They have insinuated their influence into newspaper sanctums. They have dictated policies in legislative assemblies, seated their own professional servants upon the judicial bench, corrupted nominating conventions, and by trick and device diverted the course of public opinion itself. And now, glutted with pelf and drunken with power, they cynically propose to rob the public boldly, directly from the public Treasury, as for a generation they have been robbing it stealthily by means of protective tariffs.

That in doing this they will cause the whole protection edifice to crumble is reasonably to be expected. But that much-desired ending of the most absurd and demoralizing superstition of economic history is not a reason for advocating subsidies as the destructive means. This would, indeed, be doing evil that good might come. Much more to the honor of American intelligence and American sensitiveness to right and justice would it be for American citizenship to condemn the protective scheme with deliberation than to leave it to the fates.

Rather than approve the shipping subsidy, though in the reasonable hope that its development would expose the absurd iniquity of protection and loosen the grasp of that superstition, conscientious and intelligent citizens will demand that the shipping subsidy be condemned because it is one of the forms of that superstition. Free traders would rather kill protection with the club of common sense or the sword of common justice than help to poison it with an overdose of subsidies, however reconciled they might be to seeing it so poisoned by its friends.

SUBSIDY PRETENSIONS—BITS FROM OUR HISTORY OF THIS KIND OF LEGISLATION—FAILURE OF GREAT EXPECTATIONS—PAST EXPERIENCES WITH SHIP SUBSIDIES ARE ANYTHING BUT GRATIFYING TO OUR PRIDE—FIGURES THAT ARE INTERESTING JUST AT THIS TIME—SAME OLD ARGUMENTS USED TO-DAY.

Shipping subsidies are not a new thing to this country. We have experimented with them several times, and always with results anything but gratifying to our pride. In every case the promoters of subsidy schemes in Congress have uttered the ancient and threadbare fallacy about enormous expansion of trade to follow the granting of subsidies, and they have always ascribed the failure of their forecast to insufficient subsidy.

As far back as 1850 Congress voted a subsidy to the Collins line. The subsidy failed to build up a great steam merchant marine, and foreign commerce was not noticeably affected. The venture ended in disastrous failure, bringing ruin to all engaged in the enterprise. In the period from 1848 to 1853 Congress expended more than $15,000,000 in subsidies similar to the subsidy now proposed. During that period our foreign trade went on increasing exactly as if no subsidy had been paid. When the subsidy policy was discontinued, our foreign trade continued to increase more rapidly than before.

From 1858 to 1865 the United States Government gave no subsidies for the ocean mail service. In 1864 a bill was introduced authorizing the payment by the United States of $150,000 per annum for a monthly steamship service between Rio Janeiro and a United States port north of the Potomac River. On reporting the measure favorably, Mr. Alley, of Massachusetts, said:

"Establish this steam communication with South America, and you will not a great while longer see England exporting $28,000,000 worth of merchandise and taking in return less than half the amount, and the United States exporting only $6,000,000, while the import of Brazilian products is over $20,000,000."

The bill became law, and on August 29, 1865, a contract was made with the United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company for a monthly service between New York and Rio Janeiro. The line continued for ten years, costing altogether $1,500,000. When the subsidy was withdrawn the company suspended operations. So ended the high expectations proclaimed by Mr. Alley.

The following table shows the conditions of trade with Brazil before and after the subsidy:

Year.	Imports.	Exports.
1875	42,027,863	7,742,359

The increase of the import trade was due not to the steamship line but to the removal of the duties on coffee and rubber. In 1875 the imports of coffee were $35,099,274 and of rubber $2,519,437. After the Brazilian line was discontinued our trade with Brazil went on increasing more rapidly than before. Meanwhile the commerce of England with Brazil, without the protection of a Government subsidy, grew much more rapidly than our own.

In 1866 the Government entered into a contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for carrying the mails to Japan and China via Hawaii. The service was to be monthly, with a subsidy of $500,000 per annum.

In the session of 1866-67 Congress released the company from the necessity of stopping at Hawaii, and during the same session voted a subsidy of $75,000 per annum for a distinct service to those islands. This was merely an indirect way of raising the subsidy to the Pacific Mail by $75,000 a year. In 1872 the company offered to run another monthly service to China and Japan for an additional $500,000 a year. With some difficulty a bill authorizing such a contract was passed by Congress in 1873. It was afterwards discovered that bribery had been used to secure the passage of this measure. It was proved that the company had spent more than $1,000,000 to obtain the subsidy. The new contract was abrogated by the Government because of the improper methods used in gaining the necessary legislation, and the subsequent failure of the company to fulfill the conditions of the contract. In 1873 the service to the Sandwich Islands was given up by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. It had lasted for six years and cost $425,000.

The state of trade with Hawaii before and after the experiment is given below:

Year.	Exports.	Imports.
1867	$846,492	$1,070,252
1873	674,191	1,275,061

The statistics show a decrease in exports of nearly $200,000, and an almost equal gain in imports. In the protectionist view, this is a loss of nearly $400,000. Really it shows that trade was almost stationary, despite the fact of American ships subsidized to carry the flag.

The first contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company expired in 1877. The company actually received from the Government during ten years for this service $4,583,333.33.

The statistics of the trade with China and Japan before and after the subsidy are as follows:

Year.	Imports.	Exports.
CHINA.
1867	$12,112,440	$3,578,808
1876	12,947,633	4,729,892
JAPAN.
1867	2,618,283	712,024
1876	15,470,047	1,099,696

The only increase in trade of any consequence was in those articles from which the tariff had been removed, viz, tea and raw silk.

The melancholy result of these attempts to build up commerce by paying ships to sail back and forth over the seas ought to be pretty conclusive. But we find people to-day engaged in prophesying the wonderful results that will inevitably follow when their little ship-subsidy scheme is enacted into law, and, what is more incomprehensible, they find people to believe them.

In 1879 it was attempted to revive the scheme to subsidize a line to Brazil, but the Pacific Mail scandal was too fresh in the memory of the people, so the scheme had to be dropped. The same arguments now employed were used then. It was claimed that the only thing that prevented our having an enormous and profitable trade with South America was the lack of subsidized steamers. When these were furnished they were found of no value to our business men, for we had little to export to Brazil and no mails to exchange. Private enterprise was then and is now able to take care of the trade. Our imports have continued to grow, because Brazil has coffee and rubber, which we need. We have sufficient communication with South America, as was shown by the committee of the National Association of Manufacturers which visited South America in 1896. Direct shipping facilities are ample and in excess of demand, while rates are usually lower than freights to and from England. The same is true of communications with European and Asiatic countries. There are more ships than exports to fill them. Freight rates were never so low, and shipbuilding was never so extensive all over the world. Yet the Republicans tell us that we have not ships enough to carry our exports.

ROYAL MEEKER.

JUST A PLUCK-ME GAME—THAT IS ALL THERE IS TO THE SHIP-SUBSIDY SCHEME—REVIEW OF REPORT ON THE BILL—A SALLY INTO THE FIELD OF PROPHECY—ROUTES PROPOSED, AND THEIR RESPECTIVE SHARES OF PLUNDER—ARITHMETIC THAT DOES NOT FIT—FACTS ON THE OTHER SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

The report of the Senate Committee on Commerce deserves to rank high among the prophetic books of the protectionist scriptures. The preamble says:

"The purpose of this bill is, and its reasonably certain results will be within ten years, to establish the maritime supremacy of the United States in the trade on the Pacific with Asia and the Philippines and on the Atlantic in the trade of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea, to establish on a secure basis the trade between the United States and the Republics of South America, and to give the United States a respectable representation in the trade of the North Atlantic. Incidentally it will give to the United States an auxiliary navy second only to Great Britain's, an ocean mail service superior to that of Great Britain, France, or Germany in all respects, except for a few years more, possibly, the service between New York and England and the North Sea ports. It will so extend shipbuilding as to transfer in time—certainly from Germany and possibly from Great Britain—to the United States the center of that industry as the centers of other industries recently have been transferred. Finally, it will give to the United States a measure of maritime independence corresponding to our industrial and agricultural independence. This object and these results are perfectly well understood abroad and afford the reason why the measure is regarded with undisguised apprehension and hostility by the shipping interests of Europe."

It is possible that some, perhaps all, of these prophetic utterances will come true in time, but it requires a degree of genius that can not be distinguished from madness to assert that all this shall result from the passage of this bill. Mr. FRYE certainly does not intend to belittle the importance of his legislative labors.

But this is not the most remarkable paragraph in this remarkable report. It is proposed to establish the following ocean mail routes, some new and some old:

	Subsidy.
ATLANTIC OCEAN.
Semiweekly to Jamaica[a]	$123,569
Semiweekly to Habana[a]	73,476
Weekly to Mexico[a]	130,104
Semiweekly to Southampton[b]	1,713,863
Once in 10 days to Venezuela[a]	81,288
Fortnightly to Brazil[c]	243,100
Atlantic total	2,335,400
PACIFIC OCEAN.
Weekly to Manila[c]	1,901,952
Weekly to Japan, China, Hongkong[c]
Weekly to Hawaii[c d]
Fortnightly to Pango-Pango[d]
Fortnightly to Australia[d]	433,000
Pacific total	2,334,952
Grand total	4,700,352

These services are to be performed in a very superior manner by larger and swifter steamers than any now in service, except on the North Atlantic. According to the committee's estimates (made by the Commissioner of Navigation) the cost of building a ship here is at least 30 per cent greater than in England, and wages of American seamen are about 40 per cent greater. England pays $5,536,000 per annum in subsidies. Granting the truth of these statements, it would seem to the man of ordinary intelligence that we would be compelled to pay at least 35 per cent more than England in subsidies in order to overcome her natural and artificial advantages. But Mr. FRYE and his colaborers are not men of ordinary intelligence. By a simple arithmetical miracle, which they have not time to explain, they show how, by paying only $4,700,000 in subsidies to the International, the Pacific Mail, and two or three other lines, it is possible not only to revive our drooping merchant marine but to cause England to retire from the sea. It is so simple and withal so economical that it would be incredible did we not know that HANNA and other philanthropists are willing to risk the people's money in the scheme.

There are some facts, however, which it may be of interest for the people to know before they assent to furnish the funds for carrying out this little miracle.

First. The greater cost of building ships in America is a myth. Tjard Schwartz, the naval constructor sent over here by the German Government, reported to his Government that steamers were being constructed here as cheaply as in Great Britain. The Marine Review, which favors subsidies, says in the issue of November 7, 1901:

"The Main was reconstructed at a cost of about $600,000. It was an immense undertaking, and its execution to the satisfaction of the inspectors representing the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, and the surveyors acting for the classification bureau, Germanisher Lloyd, demonstrates that American shipbuilders are skilled in the trade and are strong competing factors with which foreign shipbuilders must in the future reckon. It is reasonable to assume that could the Main have been repaired in Germany or England at less cost than that for which the work was performed in the United States the ship would have been taken across the Atlantic."

Second. The cost of running ships under the American flag is also mythical, for our shipmasters hire seamen in the same ports at the same wages as foreign shipmasters.

Third. As there is no limit placed upon the amount to be expended for subsidies, it is probable that the total will be much in excess of $4,700,000 for services much inferior to those foretold by the Committee on Commerce in its sanguine forecast.

Fourth. The sums expended for actual mail service will be a small part of the total amount paid out in so-called mail subsidies, for the reason that vessels are paid for size, speed, and miles sailed, not for service performed.

The United States Government is now paying higher rates for ocean mail service than any other country except, perhaps, France and Italy. The sum paid to the International Navigation Company for full service is $757,000 a year—17 per cent on the total value of the four mail steamers belonging to that company, allowing a capitalized value of $100 per ton, which is greatly in excess of the real value of the vessels. The effect of the pending bill will be to increase the rate of pay to 27 per cent on this watered capital for the identical service.

Last year the Government paid the New York and Cuba Mail Company $201,078 for carrying 1,995 pounds of letters and 30,864 pounds of printed matter, or an average of $6.12 per pound. This is about ninety times the very liberal rates of the International Postal Union. Under the new bill the company will get about the same sum; but if they put on larger and swifter vessels they will collect a higher rate of pay, although the service performed may be actually of less value.

Under the postal act of 1891 the Admiral Line is receiving $117,490 for performing a service worth $2,911.83 at competitive rates; the Oceanic Company is to receive $283,283 for a service worth $8,432.78. The Republican party proposes to increase these extravagant subsidies to a few large shipowners on the plea of building up the American merchant marine. To-day we are compelled to listen to the same arguments which have done service since 1845, when the Collins Line was voted a subsidy. In every instance we have been assured by the advocates of subsidy that the one thing needed to rehabilitate the American merchant marine was a subsidy. The Government has already spent upward of $30,000,000 in these so-called ocean-mail subsidies, and the merchant marine is not yet rehabilitated according to the idea of the subsidy lobbyists.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, reported an amendment providing that the appropriation for the connected and separate United States and other maps prepared in the General Land Office may be made available for expenditure during the fiscal year 1903, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRITCHARD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10005) granting an increase of pension to William A. Henderson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1739) granting an increase of pension to William S. Frost; and

A bill (S. 4752) granting a pension to Betsey Jones.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10462) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Munson;

A bill (H. R. 12777) granting an increase of pension to George H. Young;

A bill (H. R. 10325) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Stonesifer;

A bill (H.R.10394) granting a pension to William H. Ruggles; and

A bill (H. R. 6009) granting a pension to Absolum Maynard.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 5852) granting a pension to Robert P. McRae; and

A bill (H. R. 1523) granting a pension to Susan J. Taylor.

Mr. PETTUS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12764) amending the act of March 2, 1901, entitled "An act to carry into effect the stipulations of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Spain, etc.," reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6165) amending the act of March 2, 1901, entitled "An act to carry into effect the stipulations of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Spain, etc.," reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BARD, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13875) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DEBOE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 14732) granting an increase of pension to Grace M. Read; and

A bill (S. 4296) granting a pension to Andrew Ady.

Mr. DEBOE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8712) granting an increase of pension to James S. Young; and

A bill (S. 6123) granting an increase of pension to Thomas L. Collins.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2483) granting a pension to James A. Clifton;

A bill (H. R. 2487) granting an increase of pension to William S. Hosack;

A bill (H. R. 10263) granting an increase of pension to Daniel J. Byrnes;

A bill (H. R. 1347) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Webb;

A bill (H.R. 3825) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie I. Rich;

A bill (H. R. 12056) granting an increase of pension to Warren C. Plummer;

A bill (H. R. 14774) granting a pension to John C. Clarke;

A bill (H. R. 6031) authorizing the payment of part of the pension of Ira Steward to Adell Augusta Steward;

A bill (H. R. 3513) granting an increase of pension to James W. Young;

A bill (H. R. 14206) granting a pension to Mary J. Moore; and

A bill (H. R. 7618) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Sheridan.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 5639) granting a pension to William H. Durham; and

A bill (H. R. 13355) granting an increase of pension to William H. Snyder.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 6101) granting an increase of pension to Reuben Andrews; and

A bill (H. R. 13367) granting an increase of pension to Jonathan Walbert.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. SIMON), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4093) granting an increase of pension to William Barrett; and

A bill (S. 5812) granting a pension to Wallace Fairbank.

Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. SIMON), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

Mr. QUAY. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5956) to provide for the allotment of the lands of the Cherokee Nation, for the disposition of town sites therein, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment. I desire to say that I will submit a written report hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

LIST OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a schedule of all claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, since the allowance of those heretofore reported to Congress at the present session; also a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims not heretofore reported to Congress.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in Indian depredation cases requiring an appropriation by Congress.

LIST OF JUDGMENTS.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a list of judgments rendered against the United States by the circuit and district courts of the United States under the provisions of the act to provide for bringing suits against the Government of the United States, approved March 3, 1887, not heretofore reported to Congress.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

COURTS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2066) to change the terms of the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, to report it favorably without amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2063) amending an act creating the middle district of Pennsylvania, to report it favorably without amendment, and I am also instructed to ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is impossible to hear what is going on; there is so much confusion in the Chamber. I should like to know what bill this is.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I can explain it in a moment. In the middle district the circuit and district courts of the United States are to be held at the points named—Scranton, Harrisburg, and Williamsport—and that the terms shall be changed for holding courts as there stated. It also provides that the records shall be kept at the original point, Scranton; but the records of the late courts of the western district at Williamsport shall remain there.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does it come from the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. MCCOMAS. From the Judiciary Committee. It has passed the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISABELLA BULLOCK.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. CARMACK on the 19th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Isabella Bullock, widow of John H. Bullock, late a laborer of the United State Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

ARTURO R. CALVO.

Mr. PROCTOR. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 118) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point, Arturo R. Calvo, of Costa Rica, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to permit Arturo R. Calvo, of Costa Rica, to receive instruction at the Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby: And provided further, That in the case of the said Arturo R. Calvo the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 to pay A. H. Howe for expenses incurred and for services in filing and indexing the records, briefs, and arguments of counsel in the insular cases in the October term of the Supreme Court of the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PRITCHARD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500 to pay Calvin J. Cowles, late assayer in charge of the United States assay office at Charlotte, N. INDUSTRIAL PLANTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return to the House of Representatives the enrolled copy of the bill (S. 5718) "providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or industrial plants in the Indian Territory," and request the House of Representatives to vacate the action of the Speaker in signing said enrolled bill, and to return said enrolled bill and the message of the Senate agreeing to the amendment of the House of Representatives to said bill to the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5718) providing for the sale of sites for manufacturing or industrial plants in the Indian Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is entered.

BEILINBERG AGAINST SCOTT.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit a resolution which I ask may lie on the table. I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas submits a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate all of the papers in the case of Beilinberg against Scott, including all communications sent to and received from the ambassador of the United States to Mexico in respect to the same.

Mr. TELLER. We have been heretofore in the habit of "directing" the Secretary of State.

Mr. BAILEY. It would please me very much more to have the Senate "direct" than to "request," and when the resolution is before the Senate I will gladly accept the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over at the request of the Senator from Texas.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. PRITCHARD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee or its subcommittee in connection with bills pending before it, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CALIFORNIA NATIONAL PARKS.

Mr. BARD. I move that the bill (H. R. 14511) to authorize the relinquishment to the United States of claims and patented lands within the national parks in the State of California, and to permit the settlers and owners thereof to secure other lands, outside of said parks, in accordance with section 24 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 9th instant approved and signed the act (S. 312) providing that the circuit court of appeals of the eighth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado, or in the city of Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, on the first Monday in September in each year, and at the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, on the first Monday in May in each year.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 21st instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2769) to fix the fees of United States marshals in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

An act (S. 2921) to place Henry Bieberbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell on the retired list of enlisted men of the Army;

An act (S. 3992) granting an increase of pension to David M. McKnight;

An act (S. 4769) to fix the fees of jurors in the United States courts; and

An act (S. 6030) authorizing the Newport Bridge, Belt and Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the White River in Arkansas.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 619) providing for recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 197) making certain appropriations of April 17, 1900, for printing United States maps, available for the fiscal year 1902, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1026) to fix the compensation of district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Army appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not yet completed. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Army appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

Th motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13. That matter was before the Committee on Military Affairs this morning and this course was unanimously agreed upon.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the report from the House read, so as to see what is the status of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The action of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 20, 1902.

Resolved, That the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, and requests a conference thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. HULL, Mr. CAPRON, and Mr. HAY be the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

That the House adheres to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 13 and 14.

That the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "; and whenever in the opinion of the President the lands and improvements, or any portion of them, of the military posts or reservations at Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., have become undesirable for military purposes he may, in his discretion, cause the same to be appraised and sold at public sale at not less than the appraised value, either as a whole or in subdivisions, under such regulations as to public notice and terms and conditions of sale as he may prescribe, and the proceeds to be deposited in the Treasury; and a sum of money not exceeding the proceeds of such sale or sales at each of such places, respectively, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of such land at or in the vicinity of Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., respectively, as may be required for military purposes, and for building barracks or quarters on such lands to be devoted to military purposes; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make such purchases of lands for the establishment of military posts at or in the vicinity of such places, respectively."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary situation of the bill? The other day we insisted on our amendments and asked the House for a full and free conference. I should like to know what the House has done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the House has just been read to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There was much confusion, and besides——

Mr. TELLER. Can the Chair state what the House did do?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House insists upon its disagreement to about twenty amendments and asks a conference thereon. Then the House notifies the Senate that it adheres to its disagreement to amendments 13 and 14. It also notifies the Senate that it recedes from its disagreement to Senate amendment 15 and agrees to it with an amendment, which amendment has been read to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Owing to the confusion, I was not able to catch it, and I wish it might be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment of the House to amendment numbered 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to recede from amendment numbered 13.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I now move that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed by the House to Senate amendment numbered 15, insist upon the Senate amendments, except No. 13, from which we have receded, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I should like for my own information to know something more as to what will be the status of this bill when the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] shall have been agreed to? As I understand the situation, this bill was sent to the House of Representatives without in any way dealing with the message sent to us by that body asking a conference, and when the bill reached the House with our request for a full and free conference the House proceeded to consider the bill and paid no attention whatever to the message we sent to them. I understand that is the situation; that is to say, we asked the House for a conference on these disagreeing votes. They did not agree to that conference, but proceeded, in the first place, to adhere to their disagreement to amendment numbered 13 and amendment numbered 14, and to ask for a conference upon certain specific amendments, namely, 1, 2, 3, etc.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They agreed to another amendment, numbered 15, with an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; they agreed to amendment numbered 15 with an amendment, but they do not ask for a conference on that amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. So I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. The House has asked for a conference upon certain specific amendments, and they adhered to their disagreement to amendments numbered 13 and 14. We having now receded from amendment numbered 13, that takes that amendment out of the field.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But it leaves No. 14 as having been adhered to by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; adhered to by the House, and it leaves No. 15 amended by the House, but not in conference, as I understand the motion of the Senator from Vermont. Now, it seems to me, Mr. President, that we ought to deal with these questions in order that we may reach a conclusion upon this bill. The House adheres to its disagreement to amendment numbered 14. The motion of the Senator from Vermont does not and can not, so far as I believe, take into consideration amendment numbered 14. So when our conferees meet with the House conferees amendment numbered 14 will not be in conference and it can not be in conference.

I should be glad to know from the Senator from Vermont how he proposes to deal with amendment numbered 14. I think the real parliamentary situation is that if we intend to reach a conclusion upon this bill we ought now to recede from amendment numbered 14, that we should disagree to the House amendment to the Senate amendment numbered 15, and ask for a conference with the House upon that.

That seems to me the way for us to reach a conclusion upon this bill, the House having in the first instance sent with their request for a conference a resolution which was regarded by the Senate as in a sense offensive, as one that ought not to have been sent to us. We appointed a committee to consider that question. Pending that, however, we returned the bill to the House, and they dealt with the bill again. Therefore, as I understand, the original situation has disappeared by the action of the House, and whatever offensive message they sent to us has been now removed from the consideration of this bill. So we are again in a condition of comity with the House respecting the bill, and, being so, I think we ought to so deal with it as to reach the earliest conclusion possible; but I fear that with the motion of the Senator from Vermont we shall not be able to deal with the matter in that way, and therefore I shall move later on, if somebody else does not make the motion, that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 14.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I shall be very glad indeed of any action on the part of the Senate that will clear the atmosphere and put this bill in the way of passing.

As to amendment numbered 13, from which the Senate has receded, I made the motion some days ago to recede from that amendment, but the majority of the committee, and apparently the sentiment of the Senate, was against that. I thought by receding from it then, before the vote of the House of adherence to their disagreement, might have led to an agreement. That, however, is now out of the way.

Amendment numbered 15 is merely the change of one word; it is an increase of the appropriation from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000. The committee did not feel that the House should have acted upon that in this summary way of adhering and stopping us from the simple privilege of increasing an appropriation. There was not on the part of the committee, and certainly not on my part, a desire to insist upon the entire amount, but that we ought to adhere to the principle that we may increase an appropriation without having it stopped in this summary method.

As to amendment numbered 15, the situation is like this: There is an unexpended appropriation of $850,000 for barracks and quarters. Five hundred thousand dollars of that sum is in this bill reappropriated and made available for the construction of the engineering school. It is changed from the proper use of barracks and quarters to military posts. Amendment numbered 15 seeks merely to make the remaining $350,000 of that former appropriation available for a similar purpose. It seemed to us inconsistent that the appropriation of $500,000 should be left free to go into conference and that the remaining appropriation of $350,000 for a similar purpose should be adhered to. The committee had hopes—and they were able to agree this morning unanimously upon the matter—that if the remaining questions should be disposed of it would leave only one amendment, No. 14, and this partial amendment to No. 15 in question; and that perhaps some way may be found within the day to dispose of those satisfactorily.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has not answered the question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and that is: "What will be the parliamentary situation as to amendment numbered 14, the House having adhered?"

Mr. COCKRELL. The conferees will have to settle what that is.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will that amendment be in conference after the House has adhered?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not strictly in conference, but the conferees might possibly, if the matter were intrusted to them—and the Senate can delegate that much of its power to them—be able to settle this much-vexed question satisfactorily for the Senate and the House. If the Senate, however, prefers to take charge of the matter, as it has had it, I am perfectly willing to let the Senate manage it. We thought, however, in the Military Committee, that if this matter could be left in the hands of the conferees we could settle it; but if we have got to explain in the Senate everything there is a possibility of happening we can not do it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But the question which I asked, Mr. President, was not so much with reference to the contention over these matters between the Senate and the House, as to whether that particular amendment would be in conference? Where will it be? Will it be in the hands of the conferees? Will the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon that amendment be in conference by passing the motion which the Senator from Vermont has made? I understood that was the question which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] asked, and I have heard no answer to it. As a matter of parliamentary procedure, I think it quite well that it should be determined now.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has substantially answered the question. The matter will not be in conference strictly; but perhaps a general conference on the bill and a formal discussion of this matter may result in a report to the two Houses that will lead to an agreement.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, amendment numbered 14 will not be within the jurisdiction of the conference. Now, what are we to do with it? I do not know but it is correct to say that we may instruct the conferees to take charge of that amendment; but if we do nothing regarding it, it does not seem to me that the conference committee will have any authority whatever to touch that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entirely right; that the amendment referred to will not be in conference.

Mr. FORAKER. I rise to inquire, Mr. President, what will become of the amendment? My inquiry is as to what is the correct parliamentary practice and what will be the parliamentary result. The two Houses disagree as to an amendment and the House directs its conferees to adhere to their disagreement.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; the House itself adheres.

Mr. FORAKER. I mean the House adheres, and then it appoints a conference.

Mr. TELLER. It directs its conferees to adhere.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand that the House having adhered precludes the House from reconsidering their action and agreeing with the Senate if the Senate also should adhere. We have as much right to adhere as has the House. I have some hesitation about discussing this matter.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I should like to read from Jefferson's Manual on this point.

Mr. FORAKER. I should be very much obliged to the Senator from Georgia if he would read something to throw some light on the muddle.

Mr. BACON. I confess, Mr. President, that according to my idea of strict parliamentary law, the point made by the Chair and by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and reiterated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is a good one, and that is, that after adherence there can be no consideration by a conference committee; and I am a little surprised, on turning to Jefferson's Manual, to find a different rule laid down. It is that which I propose to read to the Senate.

On page 138 of Jefferson's Manual, included in our Senate Manual, upon that subject there is this. I shall read a little more than the direct paragraph to which I desire to call attention, because I wish the connection may be properly preserved. At the beginning of the paragraph we find:

A conference may be asked before the House asking it has come to a resolution of disagreement, insisting, or adhering.

I omit the reference to the authorities which are given. The author proceeds:

In which case the papers are not left with the other conferees, but are brought back to be the foundation of the vote to be given. And this is the most reasonable and respectful proceeding; for, as was urged by the Lords on a particular occasion, "it is held vain, and below the wisdom of Parliament, to reason or argue against fixed resolutions and upon terms of impossibility to persuade." (3 Hats., 226.) So the Commons say, "An adherence is never delivered at a free conference, which implies debate." (10 Grey, 137.) And on another occasion the Lords made it an objection that the Commons had asked a free conference after they had made resolutions of adhering.

This is the particular part to which I had reference:

It was then affirmed, however, on the part of the Commons, that nothing was more parliamentary than to proceed with free conferences after adhering (3 Hats., 269), and we do in fact see instances of conference, or of free conference, asked after the resolution of disagreeing (3 Hats., 251, 253, 260, 286, 291, 316, 349), of insisting (Ib., 280, 296, 299, 319, 322, 355), of adhering (239, 270, 283, 300), and even of a second or final adherence. (3 Hats., 270.) And in all cases of conference asked after a vote of disagreement, etc., the conferees of the House asking it are to leave the papers with the conferees of the other.

I have simply read that to show that, while according to what might appear to be the strict rule and according to the logic of the rule, after adherence there can be no further conference, the precedents seem to be the other way.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Georgia for calling attention to the parliamentary rule. It discloses that the practice is what I supposed it was—that notwithstanding the House had voted to adhere, yet, as to that disagreeing vote, we could have a free conference according to the correct parliamentary practice. If we did not have a free conference I could not serve on this conference committee to which I have been appointed. Perhaps it will be necessary to make another appointment, in view of the fact that the House now makes this request, but I will not, and no other Senator should, serve on anything less than a full and free conference committee. Of course, the House has the right to recede and the Senate has the right to recede, and each House has receded now from one of the amendments in controversy, leaving only one other as to which the House has voted to adhere, and I understand that has no more effect——

Mr. PROCTOR. The House has receded in part.

Mr. FORAKER. The House has receded in part, but that does not take the matter out of conference. It is conceded by everybody that it is in conference. It is as though they had not proposed an amendment to it; and that being the case, if the practice is accepted, as read by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], there is no trouble about having a conference, should the motion of the Senator from Vermont prevail, and I hope that it may. If for any reason we should conclude that it is open to a conference, if the conferees of the House should take that position, we can adhere also, or we can recede, or the Senate can take such other action hereafter as it may see fit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] moves that the Senate disagree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives to the Senate amendment, insist upon its amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, the House has asked for no conference on amendment numbered 14. Therefore the motion made by the Senator from Vermont does not seem to include an agreement for a conference on amendment numbered 14; that amendment will not be in conference, as I understand the parliamentary law, and we can pass no bill until all these amendments shall have been disposed of. It seems to me we are getting a little deeper into the trouble rather than getting out of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to say a word. It seems that amendment numbered 14, especially mentioned by the Senator from Vermont in his motion, does not cure the difficulty. After what has been read by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] as respects the precedents, I will not interpose the motion to recede from amendment numbered 14 now, but I give notice that I shall do so when an opportunity occurs after the conferees have had a meeting. It is not my wish to interfere with the province of the Military Committee on this bill. I raised the question with a view to make it certain that amendment numbered 14 would not be left in midair, as it seemed to me it was and is, unless some specific action is taken respecting it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the motion made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, just a moment. I think it ought to be made to appear specifically that Senate amendment numbered 14 is insisted upon, and I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he amend his motion by inserting after "Senate amendments" the words "including amendment numbered 14."

Mr. PROCTOR. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] suggests that the words "including amendment numbered 14" be inserted in the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. COCKRELL. The words "all amendments" include everything.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it does include all; but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] stated, as I understood him, that unless amendment numbered 14 was specifically included it would be regarded as omitted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to make a statement, if the Senator will allow me a moment; because in the request of the House they exclude No. 14, naturally the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] will only include the amendments mentioned by the House; and if we omit to mention amendment numbered 14, of course they would claim that only amendments mentioned in the message of the House would be included in the conference.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator answer me, is amendment numbered 14 a Senate amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then, as the Senate insists on its amendments, that certainly includes amendment numbered 14.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; but that——

Mr. COCKRELL. The action of the House can not stop that from being a Senate amendment. Now, if this amendment is in mid-air, as it is said, then we have spent a great deal of unnecessary time over this question; and it seems we are destined to spend more. Admit that it is in mid-air, that we have got no jurisdiction, then I suggest that the Senate just leave that to the conference committee. Conference committees of the Senate in general have been able to adjust all disputes between the Senate and the House, and the Senate has approved of their action, with scarcely an exception; and yet it is now proposed that this matter is to be taken from the conference, that the conferees that are to adjust it are not to be allowed to do anything with it, and we are to be told that we have got no jurisdiction. Just let us alone now and see if we can not settle it.

Mr. ALLISON. After that appeal of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], knowing him as I do and how kindly and gently he deals with all these questions, I will not further inject opinions respecting this matter, but I can not yet quite understand why the Senator from Missouri is so sensitive about my asking to have amendment numbered 14 included. If it is true, as he says, that amendment numbered 14 is in conference by the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], a little insertion will only make it more certain, and it should not provoke suggestions by Senators that we want to take away from the conferees any power that they have or want to exercise. I certainly do not. So I make no further suggestion regarding the matter.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I can not understand how we can grant a conference for which the House does not ask. The House has not asked for any conference on amendment numbered 14. We say that we insist on our amendments and agree to the conference which the House has asked. To what do we agree? We agree to a conference in which amendment numbered 14 is not included, though we may say we include it.

Mr. FORAKER. I insist upon the words "including No. 14" being inserted in the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] moves that the Senate disagree to the House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 15; that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, and that it agree to the conference asked for by the House.

Mr. FORAKER. And I move to amend the motion made by the Senator from Vermont by inserting after the word "amendments" the words "including No. 14."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont accept that modification?

Mr. PROCTOR. I accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will put the motion in that way, including Senate amendment numbered 14. The question is on the motion as thus modified.

The motion as modified was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

OKLAHOMA, ARIZONA, AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the motion made by me a few days ago to discharge the Committee on Territories from the further consideration of the statehood bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania was not reduced to writing.

Mr. QUAY. It is in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. MASON. Let me have the floor for a moment, if you please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. QUAY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois, and then I shall desire to address the Senate, I will say to my friend the Senator from Minnesota.

SALARIES OF POST-OFFICE CLERKS.

Mr. MASON. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the bill (S. 4949) to provide for the classification of the salaries of clerks employed in post-offices of the first and second classes. I gave notice several days ago that I would make this request.

The bill has been read. It went over by consent. I ask now to have it placed upon its passage. It is on the Calendar of Business under Rule IX. I have had unanimous consent three different times to have it taken up. The RECORD shows that it has been read, and it does not even require further reading.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. MASON. It simply allows the pay of clerks in first-class offices to be increased by law, at the rate of $100 per annum, up to $1,000, and after that it may be increased by direction of the Department to $1,200. I hope there will be no further objection. I have been waiting for three weeks.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I merely wanted to know what the bill was about before I consented to its consideration.

Mr. MASON. It has been read several times. I will ask that it be again read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask to have the title of the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4949) to provide for the classification of the salaries of clerks employed in post-offices of the first and second classes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire to have the bill read?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No, sir.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has reported an amendment, which has heretofore been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OKLAHOMA, ARIZONA, AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I desire to speak to the motion now before the Senate, that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

I am a member of the Committee on Territories, and this motion intends no discourtesy to the committee, to any of its members, nor to its distinguished chairman. The procedure is not unprecedented. It is not even uncommon.

The elder members of this body will remember that in the closing days of the first Administration of President Cleveland the nomination of John E. Hartridge to be a United States judge in Florida was sent to the Senate some time before the final adjournment of Congress. Mr. Edmunds, at that time a Senator from Vermont, was chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to which the nomination was referred. Mr. Hartridge was a Democrat. The majority of the Judiciary Committee seemed to think it proper to defer action until after the inauguration of the incoming President, General Harrison. A number of Republican Senators, including both Senators from Pennsylvania, thought that the Democracy were of right entitled to the place, and some of us being personally cognizant of the high character and qualifications of the nominee of President Cleveland, joined earnestly in support of a motion made by one of the Florida Senators to discharge the committee. The effort was unsuccessful. Though a majority of the Senate favored the discharge of the committee, Senator Edmunds handled the affair in his usual masterful manner and prevented a final vote. There was no allegation then that the proceeding was revolutionary nor unduly nor unnecessarily drastic. The Senator from Vermont simply asserted his position, availed himself of his right under the rules of this Senate, and attained his object.

The so-called Sherman anti-trust law was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Finance. It was reported with amendments from that committee by its chairman, Senator Sherman, January 14, 1890. It was considered by the Senate, and March 27, 1890, on motion of Senator Walthall, a member of the Judiciary Committee, it was committed to the Committee on Judiciary by a vote of 31 yeas to 28 nays, Senators Sherman and Edmunds, chairmen, respectively, of the Committees on Finance and Judiciary, voting against committal.

On March 2, 1901, Senator JONES of Arkansas moved to proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by him over two weeks previously, on February 16, 1901, and then numbered 2413 on the Calendar, discharging the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of House bill No. 10539, amendatory of the antitrust law, and that the Senate proceed to consider the same. After debate, by a vote of 36 nays to 24 yeas, the Senate refused to consider his resolution.

On October 18, 1877, Senator Thurman, of Ohio, moved that the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the credentials of J. B. Eustis, a Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana. Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, objected to the consideration of the motion on that day, whereupon the Senate, on motion of Mr. Thurman, adjourned.

On October 19, 1877, the Journal reads as follows: "The Senate proceeded to consider the motion yesterday submitted by Mr. Thurman, 'to discharge the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the credentials of J. B. Eustis;' and, after debate, on motion of Mr. Thurman, ordered that the motion lie on the table," but, on December 1, 1877, the committee reported on the credentials of Mr. Eustis.

On November 20, 1877, Mr. Thurman submitted a resolution discharging the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the credentials of M. C. Butler, a Senator-elect from the State of South Carolina.

The resolution went over, was called up November 21, 1877, considered, and agreed to on November 26, 1877, by a vote of 29 yeas to 27 nays.

On October 17, 1877, Senator Edmunds submitted a resolution discharging the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg, a Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana. This resolution was withdrawn by Mr. Edmunds on the following day, but not withdrawn until the Senate had decreed by a direct vote "that the said committee shall consider and report upon the credentials of William Pitt Kellogg."

There have been other cases, to which it is unnecessary to recur, in which the present procedure was resorted to where the sentiment of a majority of a committee was believed to be in antagonism to the sentiment of a majority of the Senate.

The Committee on Territories is composed of 11 members. Five of these members waive all question of courtesy and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. As a matter of fact it has not been considered. The committee have refused it consideration up to the present and have postponed its consideration until next December. We ask to be discharged, because we believe consideration of the bill is unnecessary. It has already been reported favorably and unanimously to the present Congress by a committee of paramount authority—a committee of the whole American electorate, which in the year 1900 passed upon its merits. This committee has risen, but has leave to sit again in 1904.

In the last Democratic national convention there were sitting as delegates the following members of this Senate: JOHN T. MORGAN, Alabama; J. K. JONES, Arkansas; JAMES H. BERRY, Arkansas; J. C. S. BLACKBURN, Kentucky; S. D. MCENERY, Louisiana; MURPHY J. FOSTER, Louisiana; H. D. MONEY, Mississippi; W. A. CLARK, Montana; B. R. TILLMAN, South Carolina; J. L. RAWLINS, Utah; JOHN W. DANIEL, Virginia; T. S. MARTIN, Virginia.

Senator JONES of Arkansas was chairman of the committee on platform and resolutions, and serving under him as members of the committee were Senators BLACKBURN, MONEY, TILLMAN, RAWLINS, and DANIEL. The platform, which was reported by Senator JONES and read to the convention by Senator TILLMAN, contained the following paragraph, which was unanimously adopted, all of the Senators mentioned as delegates voting for it:

> We denounce the failure of the Republican party to carry out its pledges to grant statehood to the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, and we promise to the people of these Territories immediate statehood and home rule during their condition as Territories.

To explain the denunciation of the Republican party prefacing this paragraph of the Democratic platform, recur to the Republican platform of 1896, adopted by its national convention which met at St. Louis, Mo.

The following-named members of this body were delegates to that convention: HENRY M. TELLER, Colorado; F. T. DUBOIS, Idaho; C. W. FAIRBANKS, Indiana; W. J. DEBOE, Kentucky; GEORGE L. WELLINGTON, Maryland; HENRY CABOT LODGE, Massachusetts; JOHN KEAN, New Jersey; T. C. PLATT, New York; C. M. DEPEW, New York; J. C. PRITCHARD, North Carolina; J. B. FORAKER, Ohio; M. A. HANNA, Ohio; M. S. QUAY, Pennsylvania; THOMAS KEARNS, Utah; REDFIELD PROCTOR, Vermont.

Senator FORAKER was chairman of the committee on resolutions and platform, and serving with him on the committee were Senators TELLER and DUBOIS.

Senator FORAKER reported the following provision, which was unanimously adopted, all of the Senators named voting for it with the exception of Senators TELLER and DUBOIS, who had previously assented to it, but subsequently withdrew from the convention:

We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable date, having due regard for the interests of the people of the Territories and to the United States.

This promise was broken, this pledge was not fulfilled; hence the challenge in the Democratic platform.

Now, to the Republican national convention, held at Philadelphia in 1900. At that convention there were sitting as delegates Senators CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS, Indiana; ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE, Indiana (the chairman of our Committee on Territories); J. R. BURTON, Kansas; L. E. MCCOMAS, Maryland; H. C. LODGE, Massachusetts; KNUTE NELSON, Minnesota; J. H. GALLINGER, New Hampshire; THOMAS C. PLATT, New York; C. M. DEPEW, New York; J. C. PRITCHARD, North Carolina; H. C. HANSBROUGH, North Dakota; P. J. MCCUMBER, North Dakota; J. B. FORAKER, Ohio; M. S. QUAY, Pennsylvania; BOIES PENROSE, Pennsylvania; THOMAS KEARNS, Utah; F. E. WARREN, Wyoming; C. D. CLARK, Wyoming; and last, but not least, there was with them as a delegate the gentleman who now so wisely and well fills the highest office in this land—Theodore Roosevelt.

Senator FAIRBANKS was chairman of the committee on resolutions. Serving with him on that committee were Senators GALLINGER, MCCUMBER, FORAKER, and PENROSE. Senator GALLINGER was upon the subcommittee which reported to the full committee the following provision:

We favor home rule for and the early admission to statehood of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma.

This resolution was unanimously adopted by the committee on resolutions and reported to the convention by Senator FAIRBANKS. The question was stated by Senator LODGE, the presiding officer, and the resolution received the votes of the Senators named and that of the present President of the United States. Being in the platforms of both parties, this indorsement of the early admission of these Territories received the pretty nearly unanimous approval of the people of the United States.

Two years have passed since the adjournment of these conventions and the deliverance of these solemn pledges to the people of the United States, and we have already failed to redeem our promise of early statehood. The time has come when both parties must act upon this question according to their respective promises or stand before the people of the United States as self-convicted of treachery, whose declarations of principles are intentionally mendacious. Upon the Republican party especially rests the responsibility, for it has been in control of the legislative and executive branches of the Government and has been able to acquit itself to the people of the United States of every responsibility it has seen proper to assume without the aid or counsel of the opposition.

As a member of the Committee on Territories, my thought was, and four other members of that committee thought with me, that when this bill came from the House of Representatives, where it passed with practical unanimity, having been indorsed in the national conventions of 1900 by 30 members of the Senate, it should be considered at once; and when consideration was refused and afterwards postponed for six months, that it was not improper nor indecorous nor discourteous to anyone to appeal to the Senate to make its face clean before the country. If this course be insulting to the Committee on Territories, as has been urged, then nearly one-half of the Committee on Territories desire to be insulted. They condone the indignity.

It was my opinion originally that a bill might be formulated by agreement which might pass both Houses unanimously at the short session, and that the question might safely be relegated to that time. The indications now are of a very different character, and that position is abandoned. The House of Representatives has acted, and it remains for the Senate to do its duty and for the Republican side of this Chamber to promptly fulfill the pledges of the Republican party to the people of the United States.

Here and now it is declared that if the consideration of this bill is postponed until December next it will not pass this Congress, and an appeal to the future is entered to verify the prediction.

The two great national conventions of 1900, it is to be assumed, thoroughly considered and appraised the claims and qualifications of these Territories to membership in the American Union. It is scarcely necessary, therefore, to more than advert to their existing conditions.

New Mexico has been organized as a part of the public domain for fifty-six years and has been an organized Territory since 1850. Its area is 222,510 square miles, equal to the combined areas of New England, New York, and New Jersey. Its timber lands and its timber are of the best, covering a territory as large as the State of Massachusetts. Its coal lands cover territory thrice as large as Massachusetts. Its present population is about 350,000. It has 363 post-offices.

The cost of its school and educational buildings was two and one-quarter millions of dollars. The tax collected for the support of its common schools in 1901 amounted to above $1,000,000, one-half of which was paid in salaries to teachers, and its school children numbered 70,000. At the time of the taking of the last census the value of its property subject to taxation was between two hundred and fifty and three hundred millions of dollars. It has 3,000 miles of railroad completed and several hundred miles in course of construction. It produced last year one and one-half millions of tons of coal, and minerals of all kinds to an estimated value of $10,000,000. Its cattle number 1,500,000, its sheep 7,000,000, and its wool crop last year weighed 25,000,000 pounds. It still contains 55,000,000 acres of unappropriated public land. Its area subject to irrigation and crop raising is greater in extent than the area of the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut combined, and it has less than $1,000,000 of Territorial debt.

Twenty-one times in as many different Congresses has New Mexico begged for statehood. My friend, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], informs me that he has for forty years been endeavoring to press her claims, and that one bill failed, after passing both branches of Congress, because it was not taken from the Speaker's table. The present bill for its admission is the forty-sixth that has been presented in Congress. So much for New Mexico.

Arizona has been a Territory since 1863, and has an area of nearly 114,000 square miles, or, in other words, is equal in acreage to New York and New England. Its population numbers 200,000. It has 1,600 miles of railroad in operation; in addition there are nearly 400 miles under construction. It produces every variety of fruits and cereals known to the Temperate Zone. It has almost inexhaustible mines of gold, silver, iron, and coal, and though not a timber State, its forests are of as great extent as those of any of the States. It has nearly 1,000 miles of irrigating canals in operation. The assessed value of property in 1900 exceeded $38,000,000, but the actual valuation of its mining properties alone is far in excess of the figures given. Arizona comes to us as California came, "in robes of freedom, gorgeously inlaid with gold."

Oklahoma is the youngest born Territory, with an area about equal to that of the State of Ohio, largely made up of fertile agricultural lands. Its shipment of cotton in the year 1901 was 268,222 bales. It has 50 incorporated cities and towns and 681 cities and towns listed in the reports recognized by Bradstreet's. It has 202 national and Territorial banks; 22 daily, 168 weekly, 20 monthly, and 4 fortnightly newspapers and periodicals. Its population in 1900 was 398,331. The population has since largely increased and now numbers more than half a million.

At the election of 1900, 72,352 votes were cast for the office of Delegate in Congress. Twelve of the States cast a less number of votes at that election. There are 115,000 pupils in its public schools. Its schoolhouses number 2,000, and their estimated value is $760,972. The taxable valuation of the Territory in 1901 was $60,464,696; its indebtedness, $466,224. The estimated valuation of all property in the Territory is over $300,000,000.

Mr. President, the grounds for this motion have been pretty fully mentioned. They are that a postponement of this bill by the Committee on Territories until the next session of Congress will defeat it; that the motion is not novel nor revolutionary, nor discourteous to the committee, but is the usual remedy for the existing conditions; that no extended consideration is necessary, the bill having been approved by the Republican and Democratic national conventions of 1900, and afterwards at the Presidential election of 1900 by the entire American people. It has also been demonstrated that these Territories have reached the full stature of States, needing only our legislative baptism, and that they are as splendidly equipped for statehood as any Territory ever accepted into this Union.

Every Senator in this Chamber who has resided in a Territory recognizes the difference between the conditions of the Territory and the State in the advancement of civic energies, the stimulus to corporate and business development, and the assurance of commercial stability and establishment of financial confidence. During my service in this Senate many new States have been admitted to this Union. Pennsylvania has welcomed them all and assisted them over the threshold. It is difficult to perceive how any Senator from any one of those States can resist my proposition.

Whatever the fate of my motion, whatever the fate of this bill, Pennsylvania, the greatest Republican State of the Union, proclaims her fidelity to the declaration of the Republican platform, and no matter what others may do, extends a friendly and helping hand to the youngest children of the Republic.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I think the merits of the case of the admission of the Territories as States into the Union is not before the Senate upon this motion.

The Committee on Territories have taken definite and affirmative action upon this matter to take up for consideration and hearing early at the next session this bill. When that action was taken it was apparent to the members of the committee and to all Senators that it would be impossible to give any proper consideration, or indeed any consideration at all that can be called consideration to a question so large as this at the present session, or that even if the bill were on the Calendar and there should be any difference of opinion that it could pass at this session.

In short, Mr. President, the condition is merely this, that the committee desires further time for the consideration of this very important measure, and acting upon that have fixed a time early in the beginning of the next session to give the bill consideration and hearing, looking to an early report.

I think it can not be said, Mr. President, that this does any injustice.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I merely desire to ask for information what early date in the next session has the Committee on Territories fixed?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is no early date fixed.

Mr. QUAY. Is there any date fixed?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No date, and for a very good reason, Mr. President. It is perfectly impossible to agree upon a date when such a thing will be done. That must be left to the judgment and honor of the Senators who constitute the committee. There are many contingencies, and I expect the Senator in good faith to accept this response. So many contingencies might arise to prevent the fixing of a definite date for a report upon the bill that it would be unreasonable to ask it.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator leaves that point, I should like information, if the Senator would give it, as to what the precise action of the committee was?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The precise action of the committee was to take up this bill for consideration and hearing early at the next session, and that action of the committee I expect the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Senator from Ohio, and every other Senator to believe will be carried out in perfect good faith.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to have the Senator make plain, if I understood the fact to be so, is that that is the record made by the committee, and the Senator is not simply saying that they wanted to take it up early, but that the committee have passed a resolution expressing, in the exact language employed by the Senator, that the bill will be taken up early at the next session.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the case, Mr. President. I will state to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senate that I am not so familiar with the usages of the Senate as to know whether or not it would be proper to go into the action of the committee, and therefore I was stating, as chairman of the committee for the committee, what the general attitude of the committee was. But since the Senator from Ohio has asked the question, I will state that that is precisely the record made.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. How long substantially has the bill been before the committee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The bill has been before the committee between five and six weeks, I think.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Indiana state whether the bill has ever been considered at all in the committee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I will state that it has not.

Mr. QUAY. It has not. Also I will ask the Senator whether there have not been several efforts to take up the bill which were voted down by a majority of the committee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, sir; there were but two; one effort made by the Senator from Pennsylvania at the only meeting he ever attended, and the other made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] at the second meeting he had attended.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not a correct statement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the correct statement?

Mr. BAILEY. When the chairman of the committee states that I have attended but two meetings of the committee he does not state the fact.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is no intention to misrepresent the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Where there is no intention there ought to be no misrepresentation.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Senator from Iowa will state his question of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe it is not in order to state what occurs in a committee room.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I supposed so, and therefore I was merely replying to the question——

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. I will only say that Senators have already undertaken to state what was done in the committee, and it is proper to have it stated correctly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think both the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Texas will agree that there is no intention to incorrectly state the conditions. The Senator from Texas says he has been there more than twice. I stated only a casual recollection, and I thought I was right about it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, unless some Senator cites some rule which makes it improper for the chairman of a committee, when a motion is made to discharge that committee from the further consideration of a bill pending before it, to state what the committee has been doing with respect to it, I shall not believe there is any such rule, for when it is in order to make a motion to discharge a committee, certainly it is in order for the committee to defend itself and to show that it has not been derelict in the discharge of the duty that has been committed to it.

Assuming that the statements are correct (and of course if they are not they are to be corrected), I do not observe that anything has been stated here that it was not entirely appropriate to state. Certainly it is proper to refer to the fact that a bill has been pending only a certain length of time, and for this, that, or any other reason which would appeal to the judgment of this body he had been unable to bring it forward for the consideration of the committee so as to have action taken upon it in committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio that there is no rule in the rules of the Senate, but there is an unwritten law or custom that the details of the action of a committee shall not be referred to in the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I know there is such a rule in the unwritten law, but that is not a rule which applies even as to details of information when it is undertaken to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill.

Mr. BAILEY. May I be permitted to state to the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a matter of practice and not a matter of rule, and my own judgment is that when it is necessary to defend against a motion of this kind the committee may, without violating any rule of the Senate, cite the action of the committee. I think, however, that ought never to be gone into unless it is necessary.

Mr. FORAKER. I quite agree as to that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I quite agree with that. The Senator will observe it was only for the purpose of answering the questions honorable Senators addressed to me that I made any statement with reference to it, except to state that the committee had resolved to take up the bill for consideration early next session; that they expect to carry out that resolution in good faith, and that they find that it is impossible at this late day in the session, with a near adjournment before us, to give the matter such consideration as a measure of this consequence, or a measure of any large consequence requires at the hands of a committee of the Senate.

I have only two suggestions further to offer. The showing made upon the merits by the Senator from Pennsylvania would indicate that no great injury could occur to these Territories by the very brief delay which will be involved here, since the showing of the Senator is that the condition of these Territories is very magnificent.

Further, the Senator from Pennsylvania says that 46 bills have been presented to a large number of Congresses—twenty-one Congresses, I think he said—and they have failed to act upon them. Then either all those Congresses have been unwise or unjust, or else the very fact of the refusal of twenty-one Congresses to act is a matter of such moment that it would in itself suggest the wisdom of larger and fuller investigation.

I will say in conclusion, Mr. President, that the committee does not find that at this session it can give to the bill the consideration it ought to have, and asks further time. In accordance with that, a majority of the committee have agreed that it be taken up for consideration promptly at the beginning of the next session.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I do not desire to say anything on this question except that which relates to the committee. I do not propose to go into the action of the committee, although I have a certified copy from the chairman of the committee, through the secretary, of the entire proceedings there.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will yield.

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator's certified copy was furnished him upon a casual inquiry and request, verbally communicated. The Senator says it was under the direction of the chairman. The Senator requested it, and of course I complied.

Mr. SCOTT. We can not hear a word on this side.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Tennessee stated that he had a copy of the proceedings of the meeting, certified under the direction of the chairman.

Mr. BATE. With his consent, I will say.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly. The Senator made the request of me, and as a matter of course, without a word or thought, I directed that the matter might be given to him.

Mr. BATE. I am not going to use that, though the chairman used the word "directed," which would justify me in doing so. I do not care to go into this matter touching the action of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair dislikes to interrupt the Senator from Tennessee, but the Chair would state that the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 13172) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, unless there are Senators who desire to address the Senate at some length on this question, I would ask the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to allow the unfinished business to go over for half an hour and probably we can reach a vote.

Mr. STEWART. I think we will get through with the Choctaw treaty in half an hour.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I had the floor when 2 o'clock arrived; and if he will just agree to it, I will have nothing more to say, but will call for a vote. That will end it, I know.

Mr. STEWART. I am afraid we can not get a vote.

Mr. BATE. Well, I have the floor.

Mr. STEWART. There are a great many Senators who desire to be heard on the question, and I understand we will get through with the Choctaw bill in half an hour. It is very important that it should be disposed of. I am urged by the Department to have it disposed of as soon as possible in order that they may close up the business in the Indian Territory. I will give way for the Senator from Tennessee to make a speech.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator permit me to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. STEWART. All right.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent that the pending motion be taken up for consideration after the bill which the Senator from Nevada has in charge is concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that as soon as the unfinished business is disposed of the Senate shall proceed immediately to the consideration of the motion that the Committee on Territories shall be discharged from House bill No. 12543. Is there any objection to the request?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I hope the Senator will make that request after the unfinished business gets through. I do not believe that I am prepared to assent to it now.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the precise form of the proposition that is pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proper business before the Senate is the unfinished business, which at the hour of 2 o'clock the Chair laid before the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. What I desire to be informed of is the precise form of the proposition made by the Senator from Pennsylvania which was pending at 2 o'clock. He seems to regard it as in a double aspect or as a double motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Wisconsin, is that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 12543, to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments, and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. A part of the motion was that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state further that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 13172) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes, was laid before the Senate. Now the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] asks unanimous consent that after the consideration of that bill the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of his motion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator to withhold his request until the unfinished business is disposed of.

Mr. QUAY. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to object?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not objecting right now, unless the Senator from Pennsylvania compels me to do so.

Mr. QUAY. Then now is the time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I can object now, if the Senator desires. I guess I will accommodate the Senator from Pennsylvania and object now, although I was going to ask the Senator to make his motion after the Senator from Nevada gets through with his bill.

Mr. STEWART. Let us go on with the regular order.

Mr. QUAY. I give notice that when the pending bill is through I will move to proceed to the consideration of the pending motion.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13172) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribe of Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment; the amendments not to be confined to the committee, but that anyone who has amendments to offer may present them as the reading progresses and the point is reached in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BAILEY. My attention was diverted for a moment. I did not understand the request preferred by the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asked unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be proceeded with, and that the amendments of the committee be first considered.

Mr. STEWART. No; I do not make that request. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, and I do not ask that the amendments of the committee shall first be considered, but when we come to a point where there is an amendment to be offered let it be presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is their objection?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator from Nevada. I believe there is only one amendment to be offered from the committee?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I have one to strike out.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection anyway to the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and continued the reading to the end of line 18, on page 11.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that on page 11, line 17, this bill seems to limit the Indian Territory to one land office, while in the bill which passed the Senate some time ago provision was made for more than one land office. I do not know whether or not the intention is to limit the number to one land office, but it occurs to me that there ought to be a land office in each one of these nations.

Mr. STEWART. There ought to be one in each nation. That is the intention.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It seems to me, the way the bill reads on page 11, that the limitation is to one land office in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

Mr. STEWART. There ought to be one in each.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In a previous section, which has been passed over, the same language occurs.

Mr. STEWART. The word "both" ought to be inserted in line 17, after the words "opening of," and the word "office" changed to "offices;" so as to read: "the opening of both the land offices," etc.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On page 9, line 23, the same language occurs. It reads:

After the opening of a land office for allotment purposes, etc.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It says further:

In both the Choctaw and the Chickasaw nations.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas offer an amendment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The language is:

After the opening of a land office for allotment purposes in both the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, etc.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it ought to read differently. It ought to read that—

After the opening of land offices for allotment purposes in both the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, etc.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is the way it does read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No; it says:

After the opening of a land office.

It seems to me it should be "land offices" if it is the intention to have a land office in each nation. I should like to have that matter left open for consideration in conference; and if it be considered desirable to have a land office in each nation it can be done.

Mr. STEWART. It is provided for in that way in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think it is not.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the Senator has the wrong bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On page 11, beginning in line 15, the language is—

If any citizen or freedman of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations shall not have selected his allotment within twelve months after the date of the opening of the land office in said nations.

Mr. STEWART. On page 11, line 17, after the words "opening of," I suggest that the word "the" be stricken out and the word "such" be inserted, and that the word "office" be changed to "offices;" so as to read, "opening of such land offices in said nations."

I ask, however, that the matter be temporarily passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter will be passed over for the present, and the reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed, and continued the reading of the bill to the end of line 13, on page 16.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. After the word "in," at the end of line 13, I move to insert the word "the;" so as to read, "United States courts in the Indian Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 7, on page 18.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In line 7, on page 18, after the word "in," I move to insert the word "the;" so as to read, "citizenship or enrollment by said United States courts in the Indian Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 9, on page 19, section 32.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In section 32, on page 19, in line 6, after the word "in," I move to insert the word "the;" so as to read, "judgments of the courts in the Indian Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Is the bill being read now for amendment, or will amendments be in order after the reading shall have been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment at any time during or after its reading.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, it will be just as well that I shall offer my amendment at this point. First, I move, in section 32, on page 19, in line 15, after the word "judgments," to strike out the word "both;" and in the same line, after the word "fact," to strike out "and conclusions of law" and insert the word "only."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 32, on page 19, line 15, after the word "judgments," it is proposed to strike out "both;" and in the same line, after the word "fact," to strike out "and conclusions of law" and insert "only;" so as to read:

In the exercise of such appellate jurisdiction said citizenship court shall be authorized to consider, review, and revise all such judgments as to findings of fact only.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as it is in order to discuss this amendment at this time——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the amendment I before offered will be consented to without objection. On page 17, line 5, after the word "within," I move to strike out "ninety." I think the time should be made longer than ninety days, and that it would be better to have it six months. I make that motion.

Mr, BAILEY. That can not be agreed to without objection. If the judgments of these people are to be assailed at all, it ought to be done at the earliest possible time.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I will withdraw the amendment for the present. I supposed there would be no objection to it. I merely desired that it might go to conference. I do not know whether or not I am in favor of the amendment. I withdraw it, however, for the present.

Mr. STEWART. I think one hundred and twenty days would be long enough.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, this bill as it stands establishes this appelate court, as it is called, though, as a matter of fact, it has no resemblance to an appelate court, and the truth of it is that it is now proposed in its present form because the committee very wisely concluded to doubt whether its original provision was a constitutional one. The original proposition was that the courts must grant a new trial under certain circumstance. The courts have repeatedly held that the legislative department of the Government can not require the judicial department to grant a new trial, and in view of those decisions the committee have devised what they call an appelate court, which, as I said a moment ago, bears very slight or no resemblance at all to a court of appeals.

This appellate court is authorized to review both findings of law and of fact, or, to borrow the exact language of the bill, "to consider, review, and revise" the judgments of the lower court. There is no suggestion that it may reverse or send a case back for a new trial; no suggestion that there may be or must be made a final judgment in accordance with the facts; but it gives the right to "review and revise." My own opinion is that this is a subterfuge that will scarcely mislead a high court of appeals, and it is by no means certain that the committee in framing this provision have escaped the decisions of the courts against legislative demands for new trials in a judicial proceeding.

But the remarkable proposition is that here are judgments, some of them five years old, obtained in a court of competent jurisdiction, which, by the law of Congress, has been authorized to determine all matters in dispute. The people injured by this proceeding raised a great clamor that a vast deal of fraud had been committed against them. I frankly say that, in my judgment, many frauds have been committed against those Indian tribes, and that many people who hold these judgments procured them by false swearing, either on their own part or on the part of their witnesses. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who would go further to relieve those Indian tribes of such judgments than I would; but, Mr. President, it shocks my sense of judicial procedure that a vast number of honest judgment holders shall be exposed to the vexation, delay, and expense of a new trial in order that the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations may be relieved against dishonest judgments. As a means of protecting the Indians against dishonest judgments and at the same time protecting honest men in the judgments which they have obtained, I proposed an amendment which authorizes this court to set aside any judgment which might appear to it to have been obtained by fraud or perjury. The answer was made that these terms were not broad enough—that there were judgments there procured upon a state of facts which might not fall wholly within the definition of fraud or perjury.

The Senator from Connecticut, in his address to the Senate—and the Senator from Nevada, too, seconded the statement—said that many of these judgments were rendered by the court without investigation on its part and upon the report of referees who were interested as attorneys in many of these cases. The next morning after the report of that debate appeared in the RECORD a young lawyer whom I have known for several years came to my office in the Senate Annex and volunteered the statement that he was the referee who considered nearly all of these cases in the Chickasaw Nation.

He made the further statement that he is an enrolled citizen of the Choctaw tribe; that he was such when he was appointed referee; that his citizenship was not involved in this controversy, and that he had never been employed by a single claimant of citizenship in this litigation. And yet the Senate was told that while these judgments were not of that fraudulent character which could be set aside under my amendment, that they were fraudulent because of the interest and misconduct of the referees; and Senators made that statement, I have no doubt, in good faith.

This young man declared that he was appointed a referee by Judge Kilgore; that he took these cases under consideration and made his reports, but that before his reports could be acted upon and disposed of by the court Judge Kilgore died, and Judge Townsend was appointed to succeed him, and that Judge Townsend rejected many of his reports and sent others back to a referee appointed by Judge Townsend to succeed the referee appointed by Judge Kilgore. That is the statement of the man who served in that capacity, made voluntarily to me. And yet the Senate was asked to believe that these attorneys who were seeking to establish many claims for many claimants were serving as referees in other claims.

I do not know enough about the proceedings in the Choctaw Nation to say who was the referee and what were the circumstances, but I do say that before the Senate shall sanction the opening of a judgment five years old it ought to be certain that fraud has been committed. If the information of the committee which has reported and which supports this provision is no more reliable as to the Choctaw country than it was as to the Chickasaw, then the Senate may well hesitate to accept their conclusions and recommendations.

Not only, Mr. President, do they ask us to open judgments five years old upon the vague and indefinite allegation and proof that an injustice has been committed against the Indian tribes, but mark the partiality. The Indian tribe can appeal whenever the judgment of the court is against it, but there is no provision here for an appeal by a citizen against whom the court has rendered judgment. If you are going to allow appeals by the Indian tribes, why not likewise allow an appeal by a citizen defeated in his action to establish his rights as a member of the tribe?

Mr. STEWART rose.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Nevada rises as if he would offer an explanation. I will gladly yield to hear it.

Mr. STEWART. The explanation is very clear. In the first place, I do not think Congress ought ever to have interfered with the enrollment of the Choctaws or the Chickasaws. It was their own business to say who were citizens of those tribes. It did interfere, and there have been 4,000 claims taken to their lands under it. These people are not Choctaws or Chickasaws. We ought never to have interfered with the Indians. I do not think any of those who have not judgments should be entitled to come in. I think the Chickasaws and the Choctaws ought finally to dispose of the whole business. I think the whole trouble has come from interfering with their jurisdiction.

Mr. SPOONER. That may be; but will the Senator pardon me for a moment? This seems to be the question: Here were citizenship courts——

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. For the trial solely, as I understand it, of the question of citizenship. The court rendered many judgments. It rendered judgments, of course, admitting parties to citizenship and it rendered judgments denying the application of parties for citizenship. The question which I understand the Senator from Texas to put to the Senator from Nevada, and which I thought the latter rose to elucidate, was whether Congress can lawfully provide for an appeal from one class of judgments rendered by that court in citizenship cases; that is, an appeal where the judgments are rendered against the tribe, but no appeal where the judgments are rendered by the same court on the same question against citizens and in favor of the tribe.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator refer to the question of the power of Congress?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; I am referring to the power of Congress—whether it is not a fundamental principle——

Mr. STEWART. I think Congress acted unwisely——

Mr. SPOONER. But——

Mr. STEWART. Hold on. Let me finish my sentence. Do not get excited too quickly.

Mr. SPOONER. I only shook my hand.

Mr. STEWART. Congress acted very unwisely in passing this law. It acted unjustly, I think, in interfering with the local jurisdiction of the tribes. Those nations have been recognized, and they have been recognized from time immemorial in determining their own citizens. I think it was a great mistake that the law was passed at all. If the tribe would not take in these people, they ought not to be taken in at all. The decision of the tribes ought to have been final. It was an improper law which interfered with them.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask the Senator, if it will not interrupt him——

Mr. STEWART. The Choctaws ought to have the whole say. It is particularly right that these judgments unfairly obtained should be reviewed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Nevada is through——

Mr. STEWART. I am through for the present.

Mr. BAILEY. I will reply to that statement, which simply amounts to this: If Congress passes an unwise law and an American citizen obtains a judgment under it, Congress ought to set aside the judgment or invent an appellate court, without the power that is usually vested in them, in order to nullify and vacate a judgment upon the ground that the law of Congress under which the judgment was obtained was an unwise one. Is the Senator from Nevada willing to reason on that basis?

Mr. STEWART. That is not the point I made. The point is they are out. I do not think most of them who are in were properly put in. There ought to be a further investigation of that matter, and we propose, in this instance, as was done in several cases, that it may be reviewed by an appellate court or a court created for that purpose, in order that justice may be done, so far as may be. If any of these people are entitled to citizenship, let the courts determine it, since they have gone on and got a judgment, and, we think, an improper one, and the Indians are very much dissatisfied with it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator, if he will pardon me for the suggestion, ought not to say "we," because the Senator does not know about it. He has merely taken the statement of others.

Mr. STEWART. Other Senators have been on the committee longer and have investigated it for a longer time and know more about it than I do, but the testimony before the committee was extensive.

Mr. BAILEY. Did the committee have hearings on this question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes. We heard the commissioners, particularly, and others.

Mr. BAILEY. The members of the Dawes Commission?

Mr. QUARLES. I will say to the Senator that in perfecting this treaty there were present in the office of the Secretary of the Interior the Secretary himself——

Mr. BAILEY. It is a circumstance against the treaty, in my judgment, that the Secretary of the Interior was present.

Mr. QUARLES. And the Assistant Secretary and the Assistant Attorney-General, the chief headmen and their attorney, together with a delegation from the Indian Committee of each House of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Who was there for the judgment holders? That is the question. I have no doubt that the Indians were amply represented.

Mr. QUARLES. We were not making a treaty with the judgment holders. We are making a treaty with the Indians.

Mr. BAILEY. But you were making a treaty that affected the rights of the judgment holders.

Mr. QUARLES. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you believe it is a just and fair proceeding to invite everybody interested on one side to help frame a treaty that affects the rights of others and to deny the others a hearing? Will the Senator from Wisconsin say that? He is too good a lawyer to believe that that is the way to proceed judicially and too fair a man to approve that kind of conduct.

Mr. President, it may be true, as the Senator from Nevada suggests, that originally Congress ought to have taken no steps in this matter, and ought to have left the making of those rolls entirely to the Indian tribes. I will not debate that, because it is not an open question. Congress concluded that question when it passed the law which provided for the manner of establishing these rights. It said to the people of the United States "Under this law, if you make certain proof, you can establish certain rights." The people proceeded under the authority of that law of Congress. They went to the labor and the expense of employing lawyers, of obtaining testimony, which they sometimes had to travel a thousand miles to secure.

They put all that testimony before the court, and upon it they obtained a judgment which at least enjoys the sanctity of a judicial determination. Now, against all that expense, against all that labor and that pains, against the fair presumption that ought to arise in favor of every judgment, it is proposed to do what? It is proposed to authorize that court, upon the vague, indefinite allegation that substantial justice may require it, to enter a new or a different judgment.

Mr. President, this court of appeals when it comes to determine the facts finds what? I am told that a large part of the records of the cases in the Chickasaw country have been destroyed by a fire that burned the court-house of the United States at Ardmore, in the Chickasaw Nation. I believe that is true; if it is not, I will ask the Senator from Nevada to correct me.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know.

Mr. QUARLES. I understand it is true.

Mr. BAILEY. It is true. Then, gentlemen, where will you procure the papers upon which to prosecute these appeals? They have gone up in the smoke of what we will suppose was an accidental fire. You say that is against the nation's interest. I know it will be suggested that the nation will not have any of this testimony. Ah, but the fact is the judgment will stand there, with no presumption in favor of the defendant——

Mr. STEWART. The judgment has been burned up, too.

Mr. BAILEY. But the judgment can be restored. It is Will he reestablish the judgment? But there is no record of the papers in the case. They have gone up in smoke. No man can swear to their contents. The witnesses may be dead, and thus a claimant under one of these judgments, brought into court to defend his judgment, finds his documentary evidence consumed by fire, finds the witnesses mute in death, and then the attorneys for the Indians, by introducing some proof that throws some shadow over his judgment, asks the court, upon the ground that substantial justice requires it, to set aside the judgment.

Not only do they do that, but when they come to the law (they do not charge that the judges were dishonest, although they insinuate that the referees were), they come here and ask that a judgment of a court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, rendered five years ago, shall be set aside upon the ground that it was erroneous as a matter of law. Do you believe that is the proper proceeding, gentlemen? Here you can not take refuge behind the vague and indefinite suggestion that fraud and perjury have done this work. Here you get out into the open.

It is a pure question of law, unless you can impeach the honesty of your judges. I will illustrate one of the law questions which may arise in these cases. A white man married an Indian woman, and by that marriage acquired rights as a member of the Indian tribe. The Indian wife died, and the man married again a woman who has no Indian blood in her veins and has no right to membership in the tribe. The trial court held that not only is the husband still a member of the Indian tribe by virtue of his first marriage, but that his second wife, though she had no Indian blood, by virtue of his second marriage also became a member of the tribe. The facts are all admitted, and it is a naked question of law.

Now, you propose to say that if the court decided it one way five years ago and the claimants, under a judgment of the court, went into the Indian Territory, as some of them have done, and spent every dollar they possess on earth in improving the land which was to become their allotment in the final division of the land, you will now have the court set aside this judgment as a matter of law, and not only strip him of his rights as a member of the tribe and deprive him of his property, but take with it every dollar's worth of improvements he has made. Does the Senator from Nevada think that is right? Will any Senator say that is a proper regard for rights that were acquired under a solemn judgment of a court?

Mr. President, never before has there been a proposition like this in Congress. Certainly it is bad enough to call men back into court without charging that they or their witnesses have committed perjury upon the facts which may not now be susceptible of proof as they were when the law authorized proof to be made, but it is infinitely worse to take honest men with honest judgments sanctioned by a court, and five years old, and set them aside because the judge may have erred.

I am so well satisfied, Mr. President, that the Senate will not agree to such an arrangement as this, but that at least it will afford these people the protection of the law under which they acted, as decided by the court, and if it exposes them again to the uncertainties, vexations, delays, and expense of a trial it shall be only a trial upon the facts, that for the time, at least, I shall not further detain the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will really understand this proposition. In the first place, as I said before, I think it was a great mistake to set up any jurisdiction over or to interfere in any way whatever with the citizenship of those tribes. I think everybody down there whom I have met concurs in that view of the case.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Except my friend.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not be willing to say——

Mr. STEWART. But a great many do.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not be willing to say, where a great estate was to be divided, that a part of the heirs already in possession should be permitted to determine who else were heirs. I would hardly commit myself to that proposition.

Mr. STEWART. This was a government authorized to pass laws. They had legislatures and courts in both of these tribes. They have had them for the last hundred years. They have decided who were citizens and who were not. They had courts for that purpose. That our action was a mistake I think is perfectly evident from the fact that it would be difficult to find an Indian, in the true sense of the term, who has applied for citizenship to this court. They are generally white people residing elsewhere, probably voting in other States.

I have inquired of several persons who have appeared before the committee, "How do you know they are Indians? Do they look like Indians?" "No; they do not look like Indians. They look like white people." We have divided up their estate with white citizens by means of this performance. The Government having established a tribunal of that kind, which manifestly is letting in a good many white people, we are bound to take care of the Indians. The Supreme Court have had before them questions on all fours in principle with this.

The Supreme Court held that an appeal could be granted or there could be a review in cases like this where Indians are concerned. In the case of Stephens against the Cherokee Nation the court says:

> And while it is undoubtedly true that legislatures can not set aside the judgments of courts, compel them to grant new trials, order the discharge of offenders, or direct what steps shall be taken in the progress of a judicial inquiry, the grant of a new remedy by way of review has been often sustained under particular circumstances.

Then a long list of authorities is cited.

> The United States court in the Indian Territory is a legislative court and was authorized to exercise jurisdiction in these citizenship cases as a part of the machinery devised by Congress in the discharge of its duties in respect of these Indian tribes, and assuming that Congress possesses plenary power of legislation in regard to them, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, it follows that the validity of remedial legislation of this sort can not be questioned unless in violation of some prohibition of that instrument.

This is the same kind of litigation and the same kind of a case.

> In its enactment Congress has not attempted to interfere in any way with the judicial department of the Government, nor can the act be properly regarded as destroying any vested rights, since the right asserted to be vested is only the exemption of these judgments from review, and the mere expectation of a share in the public lands and moneys of these tribes, if hereafter distributed, if the applicants are admitted to citizenship, can not be held to amount to such an absolute right of property that the original cause of action, which is citizenship or not, is placed by the judgment of a lower court beyond the power of reexamination by a higher court though subsequently authorized by general law to exercise jurisdiction.

Similar legislation has been had. It ought to be had in all cases where injustice has been done. There is no doubt about the power of passing this remedial legislation. The Supreme Court have had the same case under examination from the Cherokees.

I am not as familiar as some other people are with the facts, but still on the committee I have taken pains to ask witnesses as they came along what these applicants are. "Are they Indians? Do they live with you?" "No; they live in Texas mostly, and other surrounding States, and exercise the rights of citizenship there;" and yet they become Indians in large numbers.

It is suggested that we ought to take up those who did not get judgments. As I said before, it ought to have been left to the Choctaws and Chickasaws to determine for themselves. It was unfair to organize a court and have the kind of trials they have and give them no remedy. Many of the Indians thought the law was unconstitutional. They were advised for a long time that we could not come in and take away their rights in that way. It is alleged that some of them failed to prosecute their rights because they were advised that the law was unconstitutional.

There were many reasons cited before the committee why they had not had a fair trial. They are very much dissatisfied. We are taking pretty strong measures with these tribes. We are legislating to break up their tribal relations, to make them take allotments and become citizens, and to break up all the Indian governments that they have. We are proceeding to do that, and we ought to do it in a fair way. Here is a case where they have complained from the beginning. They are entirely dissatisfied that the Government should take away their land to the amount of twenty millions in this case.

According to the estimate of Mr. Bixby twenty millions of property will be taken from the Indians in this way. They complain that they have had no fair trial. If they have had a fair trial and all these people are honest citizens who have judgments, we simply propose to organize a court consisting of three impartial judges, and it is not asking too much that they shall go before that court. They have not participated in the tribe.

It is not asking too much that they shall go before that court and make good their claims again. They are getting a good deal for nothing if they are not citizens, and the general opinion is they are not, because they are white. They are not Indians. We are trying to protect the Indians. I think we ought to deal fairly with them. That is the view of the committee. This provision is drawn precisely in harmony with the decision of the Supreme Court in a like case. It certainly seems to me that the amendment——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Nevada will agree that the case which he has cited was an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in which it expressly decided by that court that the question committed to its decision was the constitutionality of the law——

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. And it was not to review the facts?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, well.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no question that we can authorize an appeal to any court upon the question of law, and I have no doubt that where it was honestly and fairly an appeal we might even include a review of the facts. But my suggestion was that when it was merely a subterfuge to escape the ability of Congress to impose upon the court a review of the facts it might not be sustained.

Mr. STEWART. I think it is on all fours with the decision. You could hardly claim this to be obiter dicta, because they go through and consider that question at length. They hold that the law is constitutional, and they claim that they have jurisdiction to consider the whole matter. They consider all the questions raised, and they elaborately cite cases. There is no doubt about the reasoning of the court in the cases cited.

Mr. BAILEY. But the court expressly declares in that case, and it is perfectly plain, that the only question committed to it for decision was the constitutionality of the legislation.

Mr. STEWART. That was committed to it, but it still reviews. It was a statute passed after judgment. The point was made that they could not pass that kind of a statute after judgment, and they go on to hold that they could. So really they had to decide other questions besides the constitutional question. They had to decide that they could review a judgment in this way. If they could review one judgment they could review another of the same kind, and they go on and vindicate the right to review judgments. When they got to the judgment they said there was no question of the constitutionality of the law, and they reviewed the whole case and decided that they had jurisdiction to review the judgment, and they point out at great length the way to reach those judgments.

If there is a way to reach this, I am satisfied that justice requires it should be done in this way. It will be a long time before we get the Indian question settled down there if we do as great injustice as they think it is. The Indians come here and agree to a treaty, and if we are going to close that matter up we must let them have a hearing on this case and let them be satisfied that justice has been done.

Now, one of the cases went to the Supreme Court, in which the constitutionality of this kind of legislation was the issue. They thought it was constitutional after having given them legislative authority, they having had their tribal authority entirely within their jurisdiction. The law was held to be constitutional, and they are going to submit to it; but, pending the determination of this question, the allegation is—I do not know how much truth there is in it—that they did not take the same measures to defend their cases that they otherwise would; that they were misled; that as it had gone to the Supreme Court and been decided against them that the law is constitutional, they submitted to it, and we now ask that there may be such a remedy given as will satisfy justice in the premises.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I very much wish that I might make the entire Senate understand the very great importance of the proposition now pending. It will hardly be appreciated by anyone not familiarly acquainted with the situation in the Indian Territory and the state of legislation.

I may say, preliminarily, that this treaty caused a very great amount of labor to draw it; that it has received the attention of the Interior Department; that the chiefs and headmen of both these tribes were here with their attorneys, and they were met by a delegation from the Committee on Indian Affairs in both the House and Senate, and they spent considerable time together in framing this provision.

Of course, the only object of perfecting the treaty is to get it so that the Indians will ratify and approve it. If it is loaded down so as not finally to receive the approbation of the Indian tribes, all this work is for naught.

Mr. President, it is not generally understood what a great undertaking this nation has on hand in the Indian Territory. Perhaps you will permit me to remind you that for more than seventy years these five tribes—justly known as civilized tribes—have each had what I may call an independent government. Each has adopted a constitution, each has had its legislature, its executive and judicial departments. Under the authority and right of this Government the five tribes as tribes hold 20,000,000 acres of land and more, having the fee simple.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; not the fee simple.

Mr. QUARLES. Well, it is a base fee, to be accurate. Of course, a fee without the power of alienation is not a complete fee, it is true.

Mr. BAILEY. It is not only without the power of alienation, but it is, as the Senator says, what the lawyers call a determinable or a base fee.

Mr. QUARLES. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. It is to inure to them and their descendants only so long as they exist as a tribe.

Mr. QUARLES. Precisely. So far as the purposes of this discussion are concerned, it might as well be a full, complete fee, because we can not by any legislation here deprive the tribe of their title. Neither can we take away from them by any arbitrary enactment the right to have and maintain their own government down there. So at the very threshold of this matter the nation must confront this proposition, that it must have a treaty or agreement with each one of those five tribal governments. Otherwise it can not proceed a step toward the final determination of the affairs of that Territory.

Mr. BAILEY. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. QUARLES. Not at all, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator mean to say that Congress could not control the government of those tribes?

Mr. QUARLES. I do, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. That Congress can not divest their determinable fee in land is probably true, although it might pass some law that it had the power to pass, the effect of which would be to vest it. I am not able to find any prohibition in the Constitution against the Federal Government impairing a vested right, as is the case in reference to the States, though it is true that Judge Field said in the Southern Pacific cases that Congress had no power to impair the obligation of a contract. That, however, was not necessary to the decision of the case. I venture to say, if the question ever comes flat before that court where Congress passes a law in pursuance of the Constitution, that law will not be held invalid because it impairs the obligation of some contract. My judgment is, without having specially looked into the matter, that more than one law of Congress interfering with the tribal government there has been sustained by the court. Before this law we tore up their tribal courts by the roots, and this very act here, the constitutionality of which was sustained, was attacked in the courts upon the ground that it was an interference with their tribal government.

Mr. QUARLES. The Senator may lose sight of the fact that we have already an agreement with these tribes, known as the "Atoka agreement," by which the tribes have consented to certain interference by the Government of the United States. But certainly, sir, while I do not agree with my distinguished friend as to the law, I believe the courts would eventually hold that we had no authority to interfere with the dominion of those tribes over that Territory, which we gave them by a treaty which pledged our honor to them, not only that they should have and enjoy that Territory forever, but that they should never be interfered with by white citizens coming there; that they should have isolation and complete control. If the law were as my distinguished friend contends, he will concede to me that the honor of this nation was pledged to those Indians that they might have not only that title, but that they might have control entirely undisturbed by any white intruder.

So, Mr. President, it would make little difference in my view what the technical principle of law might be as long as it is conceded that in honor this nation can not interfere with those tribes. The conclusion, which I desire to present at the threshold of this discussion, is the same—namely, that we can not interfere with the dominion of those tribes over that Territory without having a treaty or agreement with them.

Now, I want the privilege of suggesting to the Senate what difficulties the Government has encountered down there in trying to bring about and harmonize affairs so as to secure treaties with the several tribes. In the first place, Mr. President, we sent a commission down there in 1893, after we had got the initial agreement with the tribe. It is known as the Dawes Commission. That Commission has been working down there since 1893 trying to get a proper enrollment of the citizens of those several tribes, surveying and appraising their lands, doing all the preliminary work necessary to a final segregation and allotment of those lands in severalty.

I quite agree with my distinguished friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that it was worse than an impertinence and it was a great injustice when this nation, in undertaking that work, assumed to take out of the hands of those several tribes the question of citizenship, which was peculiarly a question to be settled by the tribe itself. The tribe had peculiar facilities for arriving at that question which no one else possessed.

I may say, Mr. President, that from the time this nation arbitrarily took out of their hands the right to determine who their citizens were, those Indians have felt aggrieved. They have felt that the United States unnecessarily interfered with their prerogative. I have always felt that the Indians were right and that the nation was wrong. If there were any doubt about that, it is illustrated by the fact that as soon as the Dawes Commission undertook to make citizenship rolls it had to go right back to the tribal roll. It took the tribal roll and then undertook to build up on the strength of that.

After that work had progressed to some considerable extent there came an influx of white citizens—mostly from Texas, some from Arkansas—and applied to this Government Commission for enrollment as Choctaw and Chickasaw citizens. That application was made upon ex parte affidavits. It has been stated here that the Dawes Commission had no opportunity to pass upon those applications for lack of time. But, Mr. President, they were simply ex parte affidavits, and they were on printed blanks that had on them the earmarks of some legal mill in Texas where they had been run out. It required only a slight inspection of those papers to demonstrate to the Dawes Commission the fact that the great majority of those Texas and Arkansas citizens who claimed to be enrolled in these two tribes based that claim simply upon blood.

Now, the Dawes Commission decided, and rightly, in my judgment, that it was more than a question of blood; that we were dealing with a tribe, not with a race; that we were dealing with a tribe as a governmental body and not with a mere matter of lineage or race. Therefore wherever the Dawes Commission found that the applicant based his petition upon the sole fact that he had Choctaw or Chickasaw blood in his veins and did not show that he had ever been subject to the jurisdiction of the tribe or had been a citizen of the tribe they simply marked on the paper "Rejected." Now, that is all they did. They marked "Admitted" or "Rejected." They admitted several hundred of them and rejected several thousand.

Appeals were taken to the United States court from the action of the Dawes Commission rejecting the several thousand white citizens, and largely on the question I have mentioned.

From that time to this I have never seen a person, either in the Indian Territory or here, whose attention had ever been called to that matter, who did not agree that the action of the court in finally admitting some 4,000 of those applicants who had been rejected by the Dawes Commission was a gross outrage on the tribe. While my learned friend says that the initial mistake made by the Government in assuming to do that work and taking it away from the tribe is a sealed and past question, I would remind him that it still has its force and effect as to the duty now resting on the Government in this very matter in order to do justice to the Indians.

Those appeals were presented to two courts who were very much overcrowded with their ordinary jurisdiction. They were not able to consider those appeals in the ordinary way, and they resorted to masters who heard, or were supposed to have heard, the testimony and to have presented a report to the court.

It is generally understood and universally asserted in that country, which I had the pleasure of visiting last year, that there was a kind of professional reciprocity manifested by those commissioners or masters. There may be exceptional instances that are not open to this criticism, but in a great many instances those appeals were heard before masters who themselves had cases there that stood precisely upon the same footing as the case they were hearing.

Mr. BAILEY. I challenge the Senator from Wisconsin to name a single instance of that kind in the Chickasaw Nation, because I have heard a very respectable member of that bar declare that he was the referee under Judge Kilgore of cases decided by Judge Townsend and that he was never employed in a citizenship case.

The Senator from Wisconsin is a lawyer. I would hate to belong to a profession where I thought a man who had character and standing enough to be appointed a judge of the United States court would appoint a referee who would practice law in that way. It is a very serious accusation to make, and certainly it is one which I would not make unless I had some better ground than mere report.

Mr. QUARLES. The distinguished Senator from Texas may very safely throw out that challenge to me, because, of course, I have not such familiarity with the affairs of that court as would permit me to know by name who these members were.

Mr. BAILEY. Not to seem persistent with the Senator from Wisconsin, does the Senator think it entirely fair to the young men who are practicing law in the Indian Territory to make that kind of a charge against them? I suppose there are some rascals there—some, I have no doubt, came from Arkansas and Texas and some from Wisconsin. Rascals generally go to any new place. But I do know some as reputable lawyers there as can be found at any bar in the United States, and I know that at least one of those lawyers is now representing the Indian tribes in this very matter. He was formerly a citizen of my home town. He is a most respectable gentleman, a man of character and ability; and if I were sure that he would try all these cases for the Indians I would not be so apprehensive of the result. But it is a reflection upon the lawyers both for the Indians and against the Indians to suggest that lawsuits are settled in that way in that Territory.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I should dislike to make any wholesale charge against that overworked and ill-paid profession to which both my distinguished friend from Texas and myself have the honor to belong. I did not assume, as the Senator will bear me out in saying, to make that charge upon my own knowledge. I did it upon information and belief, and at the time stated to the Senate that I made the charge upon the universal consensus of opinion of every person whom I met who was approached upon that subject.

In regard to the laxity of that proceeding, however, I have something that is more than mere matter of opinion. I have here a list of some 267 names of persons who never made any application at all to the Dawes Commission, of persons who were not properly before the appellate court, whose names were interpolated into those judgments, and when the judgments were entered up these 267 persons, the list of whose names I have here, were found to have final judgments against the Chickasaw Nation for a part of their patrimony. Further, Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Can the Senator tell the Senate what became of those names?

Mr. QUARLES. I will with great pleasure. I apprehend, sir, that they would still appear there in that court as judgment creditors to-day if the Dawes Commission had not, by its agent, investigated the records and detected that great fraud. The Dawes Commission—not the clerk of the court, not the judge who presided, not any bailiff who might have been present, but the Dawes Commission themselves—went there, investigated, and ascertained this fraud, and then, of course, the court struck those names off its record, as any civilized court would have done.

Mr. BAILEY. Do the Senator's papers recite on whose motion it was the court struck those names off?

Mr. QUARLES. They do not.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator that my information is not as to the whole number, but as to one particular case; that Judge Townsend discovered it himself, and upon his own motion corrected it. The names were interpolated as the Senator suggests; but in that case Judge Townsend struck them off.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I ask any lawyer who now listens to me to consider for a moment what kind of a legal proceeding it is and how the rights of litigants are safeguarded when 267 bogus claimants can be interpolated into a judicial proceeding without its being detected or corrected, until, as I say, I learned from Mr. Bixby, who is the chairman of the Dawes Commission, that it was he or the agent of the commission that made this discovery.

Mr. President, let me say another word as to the situation in which these Indians stood down there when this great question arose. These two tribes of Indians had each one an attorney—two attorneys representing the two tribes—and on the other side, representing these white citizens, was a multitude of the disciples of Blackstone, probably the whole bar from the adjacent part of Texas and from a part of Arkansas. I understand they are good lawyers—those whom I have seen from Texas would indicate that to me—whereas the two lawyers who represented these two tribes on that occasion were stupid. The old maxim is, "Against stupidity the gods themselves are powerless." But those lawyers were not only stupid, but they were stubborn; and when you get those two things—stupidity and stubbornness—combined in a lawyer it is a bad combination.

What did those two men do representing these Indians? They were civilized Indians, it is true, Mr. President, but utterly without any experience in the courts. The Indians had never had any litigation before, and they were there like so many children, not understanding the procedure that was going on. What did those two lawyers do? They said to their Indian clients, "We will not present any evidence against these claimants; you have got evidence here, but we will not use it; we are confident we can beat that whole Dawes Commission act; we are confident it is unconstitutional, and we propose to rest your case upon that proposition."

Not knowing any better, having no experience, they permitted their attorneys to take that course. The result is that the case of the Indians was never presented to that tribunal at all. I understand full well that if these Indians had been white men, if the same rule had to be applied to them that is applied ordinarily to white citizens, we would say to them: "You were guilty of neglect; you ought not to have listened to your lawyers; you ought to have known better than to have withheld your defense."

But we can not say that to these Indians, first, because it would be unjust on the merits, and, secondly, because we sustain to them a peculiar and sacred relation. We have a relationship to those Indians which is akin to guardianship; and therefore we must look with extenuation upon their lack of experience and their mistakes. The great stubborn fact is presented here to the Senate that the case of those tribes was utterly sacrificed and never presented to that court at all, owing to the stupidity of the lawyers who appeared for the Indians there.

But that is not all, sir. There is another reason why this Government is in honor bound to pass this or some similar provision, and I may say in my judgment why the amendment offered by my distinguished friend from Texas is malapropos. His amendment is to withhold from the citizens' court the right to review those judgments as to matters of law. Mr. President, when those cases were presented to those two judges—against whom I have not a word to say, but who I believe to be conscientious and honorable gentlemen—what happened? One judge took one rule of law regarding the question of citizenship and the other judge held diametrically opposite to him. What was that question?

The very question that the Dawes Commission had considered in the court of first instance, namely, whether the applicant was entitled to affirmative relief if he showed that he had Choctaw or Chickasaw blood in his veins, or whether he must go further and show that he had been a citizen of that tribe and amenable to the jurisdiction of that tribal government. On that great fundamental principle these two judges separated, so that two own brothers having come from Texas, one of them having applied to Judge Clayton and the other to the other judge, one of them would have been admitted to citizenship on the question of blood and the other would have been rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, let me ask a question, if it will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. QUARLES. Not at all.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask the Senator what is the justice, if the brother who was admitted in the trial court shall by this new court of appeals be excluded, and still the one who was excluded when he would be entitled to admission under the new decision is denied the right of appeal?

Mr. QUARLES. I will come to that question a little later, if the Senator will permit me.

I want now to press home, while I have the matter before the Senate, this proposition, for which this great nation is responsible by reason of the clumsy machinery which is afforded down there for the settlement of this important question. It does not require a college education to understand that that legal condition of things which resulted from those adverse decisions down there is intolerable—one judge holding that it was a question of blood and the other holding that it was not a racial question at all.

As we left those Indians in trying to repair this wrong we have done them we furnished no machinery whatever for the correction of that difference of opinion in those judges, and there to-day in the Indian Territory stand those two rules of law diametrically opposed to each other, rules of decision unchanged and unchangeable, one of which, of course, is right and the other is wrong, and we have given these Indians no opportunity to determine which is right and which is wrong.

Mr. President, is not that a very forcible and persuasive reason against the amendment proposed by my distinguished friend to withhold from this court any right to review a question of law? Would my friend be in favor of perpetuating by his amendment that unjust and anomalous condition of things? That is the very reason, and one of the most persuasive reasons, why we should pass this treaty, that the facts may be investigated, the law reviewed, and the very right of the issue both of fact and of law may be determined.

But that is not all, Mr. President. These two judges differed on another question—the question of the right of intermarried citizens. Their decisions were diametrically opposed to each other on that question; and the Senator from Texas well understands that, in view of the frequency of intermarriage into both of those tribes, that is a most important and fundamental question that ought to be settled, and it ought to be settled right. You have not so settled it. You have two rules which are doing manifest injustice to a large number of those Indians.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I inquire of the Senator for information, if a person claims to be a Choctaw citizen because he has married a woman who is a descendant of some Choctaw Indian, is that a question of law which has been decided in those courts?

Mr. QUARLES. Yes, sir; that is one of them. The other one I stated while my distinguished friend from Connecticut was absent, and it is a very radical one—the question as to what it is which qualifies the applicant to a judgment of citizenship; whether it is merely a question of blood, or whether it is further than that, a question of belonging to the tribal organization as a citizen.

Mr. President, it is absolutely intolerable, not only to these Indians, who have always been complaining of it, but to every self-respecting white man, that that condition of things should be left there as a finality. I understand the fact to be that if one of those white men from Texas, who claim to have——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I must say to the Senator from Wisconsin that it is not exactly a civil thing to be continually talking about "those people from Texas," intending thereby to imply that I am taking this position because people from my State are interested in this question. I should not impute any such motive as that to the Senator in the case of Wisconsin people.

Mr. QUARLES. I must say to my distinguished friend that I think his criticism is far-fetched. I had no thought of any disparagement of the distinguished Senator by reason of his attitude.

Mr. BAILEY. Then there was not any point in the twenty times reiterated statement about "these people from Texas?"

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, there may not have been any point in anything I have said; but 75 per cent of those white claimants came from Texas, as the Dawes Commission informs me. So, in referring to them as white men from Texas, I was certainly within the record and the facts.

Mr. BAILEY. Do not be certain as to the record and the facts when you talk upon the assurance of the Dawes Commission.

Mr. QUARLES. I see my friend does not like the Dawes Commission. I can only say to him that I recognize his right to stand here and protect his constituents in any rights they have acquired by judgments in the Indian Territory or anywhere else. I should be the last man to complain of that position on his part, and I hope the Senator will absolve me from any idea of any reflection upon him in the premises.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that if white citizens—4,000 of them, who are admitted by the judgments of these courts—were fairly admissible under the law, there are probably in existence a million other people equally well qualified to be admitted; that is, they have some Choctaw or Chickasaw blood; but an examination of the legislation will convince any candid person that the view which has been taken by this nation and by the tribes themselves is that something more than blood is required in order that they may share the patrimony of these tribes which we are just about making arrangements to deliver over to them in severalty. For instance, there are living in Mississippi a very large number of full-blood Choctaws about whose ancestors there can be no doubt.

They are full bloods, and still they are not permitted under the law to go there and share the lands or the annuities of the Choctaw tribe. Why? Because, while they are Choctaws, they are not citizens of the tribe or the nation with which we are dealing. If that is so, how absolutely unjust it is to say that a white citizen coming from Arkansas, Texas, or any other State should have greater privileges in that tribe than a full-blood Choctaw living in Mississippi. The law requires that, in order to share with this tribe in the land or annuities, the full-blood Choctaw from Mississippi must first remove to the Indian Territory, take up his residence there, come under the jurisdiction of the tribal government, and thus, and thus only, can he become a citizen in that tribe in the sense in which we are dealing with him.

Let me refer for a moment to a hardship that would result from any other rule. This group of persons to whom we refer as the Choctaws, for instance, in an early day, at the earnest request of this Government, left their homes and their firesides in Mississippi and moved west of the great river out to this section of territory that was then supposed to be a little strip of land that God had forgotten.

They endured the dangers and hardships of that trip, and they were very great; they went into that wilderness, and for more than seventy years have endured the privations of the frontier; they have erected their governments there; they have built their statehouse, they have built their schools, and, Mr. President, I saw a school edifice in the Cherokee Nation when I was there which would have done honor to any Eastern city. It did not cost less, in my judgment, than $50,000—a schoolhouse that had been erected there by those Indians with their own money for the purpose of educating their young Indian children.

All this long experience these people have endured until, finally, the railroads have come in, have gridironed that Territory, white men have come in, and now there are 350,000 white men in that Territory as against 80,000 Indians.

How unjust it would be, I say, to those Choctaws and Chickasaws, who legitimately constitute those tribes, those governments, after all they have endured and suffered and done, just as the division is to made, that white citizens born in another State should come across the line, and upon the plea or the proof that they have some—no matter how little—Indian blood in their veins, step right in and share the patrimony which belongs to those Indians who deserve so well of this nation. It is a hardship which they resent, Mr. President. If the motion of my distinguished friend should prevail, it would be impossible to ratify this treaty. This is the sore spot, and if we ever have a convention with that tribe of Indians we must do substantially what the committee is asking us to do.

Let me state another thing to show the necessity of doing this now, and that is, as I said a moment since, these Indians have relaxed the rigid rules which they might have enforced against the white man. They might have kept every white man out of that domain and they might have summoned Uncle Sam's bayonets there along the line to maintain good faith and keep the white intruder out. But what did they do? They said, "No; we will permit the white man to come." They found that when the white men came they had the benefit of better physicians; they had better stores; they were better served in every way than they could be by the members of their own tribes, and so they said, "Yes, come in;" and, subject to the payment of certain taxes, which they have always insisted upon, they have allowed the white man to come, and he is there. There are 350,000 of them there.

Mr. President, that is a Territory which now practically is controlled by the will of the Secretary of the Interior, who there is almost as absolute as the Czar of Russia in his domains. After the Atoka agreement was entered into the tribal government began to decay; there was nothing else to take its place; and so, while the United States has courts there, there is practically no responsible system of law. Those people are living there practically without any law.

Let me tell you another thing, Senators. There are 50,000 little children of school age without any facilities for education whatever, growing up there in that Territory without any opportunities such as civilization offers to every child. It is a sad state of things; it is an intolerable state of things, which this Senate ought not to permit to exist a moment longer if it can be obviated. How are you going to obviate it? Simply by passing this treaty.

We have a treaty with the Creeks and Seminoles, and we are about to get a treaty with the Cherokees, we hope; but if you have a rigid rule applied, such as my distinguished friend from Texas would ask to be applied, in remedying this great injustice to these Indians, you will not get this treaty ratified; and let me say to you that next year it will be twice as bad as it is now. Why? Because civilization has gone in, new mines are being discovered, and hostile interests are being aroused, so that in a little time it will be impossible for us to get all these warring elements together into any given compact.

Now, after this great labor here, this treaty, which we now present to you, can be ratified and will be ratified by these two tribes; and that will take out of our way the greatest obstacle to the undertaking upon which the Government has set out. I beg Senators, therefore, to consider this question well, whether we can not as to our own wards afford to be lenient to their lack of experience or their ignorance or their mistakes; whether we can not afford to say that we did them a wrong when we first took this question of citizenship out of their hands, and that by reason of that wrong it becomes the more obligatory upon us to right this injustice for which, in a large measure, the Government is responsible by reason of its initial mistake, to right the wrong which occurred by reason of these different judicial determinations there, to furnish a tribunal that can review both the facts and the law, and, as the language of the bill says, let them ascertain the very right of the matter.

We can afford to do it, Mr. President. While my distinguished friend would put these Indians upon the same footing as the white man, I say we ought not to stand here and consider the niceties of the procedure or the refinements of definition; but we can, to vindicate our honor and to protect our wards, afford to do the very thing that this treaty calls for, namely, create a citizenship court, and let them right the wrong; let them take the evidence and determine what the facts are; let them relieve the Indians of this double rule as to the law; and then, when right has been done, no one will be harmed and no one can complain.

Now, just one word with reference to the suggestion made by my good friend, the Senator from Texas, and the suggestion made by my colleague a few minutes ago. My information was that the applicants who appeared before the courts down there were for the most part admitted. If there were any rejected, I have no objection whatever, so far as I am concerned, and I do not believe the Indians would (I speak only for myself now, however), if we are going to erect this court down there as a citizenship court, to extending the language of this proposed act so as to permit any of the citizens who were rejected there at that time to have the same appeal to the citizenship court that the nation has.

But there is this proposition which my friend the Senator from Nevada suggested, and which he did not elaborate. If it was true in the first place, as we both claim, that the Indians ought to have had the sole and exclusive right to determine who their own citizens were, that we ought not to have taken that away from them, this treaty, in permitting those Indians in substance to determine who shall enjoy the right of appeal, is really coming to the same proposition with which we started out. But so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that there should be an amendment which would make this a citizenship court in every sense of the word and in the best sense of the word, so that if an injustice has been done there on either side the case may be heard by appeal.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want to suggest to the gentlemen interested in this question whether it might not be the wisest solution of the matter to strike out in the Senate sections 32 and 33 of this bill, after disposing of the remainder of the bill in a way satisfactory to the Senate, and leave this question open to the conference committee to make any modification which may be wise.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not understand that the Senator from Arkansas makes any motion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is a mere suggestion on my part.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is a suggestion. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he has any doubt of our power to pass this provision allowing the tribe to appeal against the admitted citizens without also including other provisions for those who were rejected?

Mr. QUARLES. I have no doubt, Mr. President, so far as the law is concerned, of our right to do exactly what we are proposing to do, but I was only assuming on my own account to say that, so far as I was concerned, I would not object, if the Senators desire it, to having that other provision put in the treaty.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does the Senator understand that there were any considerable number rejected?

Mr. QUARLES. I do not so understand.

Mr. President, I have only a word in conclusion. My distinguished friend, the Senator from Texas, spoke about the fact, which I have heard, that the Chickasaw papers were burned at Ardmore when the court-house was consumed. If his amendment were to prevail, so that all the relief afforded under this act were a review of the facts, how much more strongly would that unfortunate circumstance apply to the Indians in the preparation of their case than it would to the claimant?

My friend well understands that where a judgment book has been destroyed there is a definite legal way by which it can be restored, and I have no doubt those judgments have been restored. If so, they stand with all the judicial force and efficacy that the original judgments did, and can only be attacked in the same way that the original determinations might have been attacked. But not so with the Indians who are seeking to overturn the structure of fact upon which that judicial determination rests. It is to their detriment that these rolls have been destroyed, because there they would get their clew to their defense on the facts if they were ever able to have any at all.

But under this treaty as the committee has presented it here what may the Indians do? They will file there simply those judgments in the Chickasaw case, without any papers, without any suggestion of witnesses or defense. But learning the name of the claimant from the judgment roll, they may produce evidence to this tribunal that the claimant was never amenable to the jurisdiction of the Chickasaw government, so that notwithstanding the fact that he may have had Chickasaw blood in his veins he never came within the intendment of the law under the citizenship of the Chickasaw nation. That finishes, then, the question of law upon which they may plant themselves and urge to the citizenship court that the law when properly administered requires something more than blood.

No, Senators, the honor of this nation, pledged as it is to those wards of the nation, is something more than mere procedure. We are not to be hampered here by the rules that courts of equity have themselves enacted to limit their own jurisdiction. This is not the case of an ordinary claimant coming into a court of equity and asking to have a judgment at law set aside, which judgment involves only property rights of the two litigants. But this is a question of a great nation under every obligation to deal honestly, justly, fairly by their wards—these poor Indians—and to remedy this injustice and outrage for which the nation itself, as I have already explained, is in a large measure responsible.

Give them, therefore, this treaty. Let the very right of the matter be determined not only as a matter of fact, but as a matter of law, and in that way the nation will have discharged its duty, kept its faith, while otherwise the Indians will condemn us and refuse to agree to our treaty, and all efforts to fit that Territory for statehood, to bring civilization and schoolhouses into it, will be of no avail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. If no other Senator desires to say anything, I desire to reply to one or two observations which have been made.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know exactly how to take the suggestion of the Senator from Texas. I did intend to say something on this subject, and I do not want to feel that I am cut off.

Mr. BAILEY. I observed that neither the Senator from Connecticut nor the Senator from Arkansas rose when the Chair was putting the question, and I thought they had determined to rest it on the elaborate argument of the Senator from Wisconsin. At any rate, being on the floor, I will proceed.

If the logic of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] is no better than his law it will not be very safe to follow him. He first stated that this land belonged to the Indians in fee simple. When I ventured to correct that statement he admitted the correction, but followed it up by saying it was unimportant.

If it was not important what kind of fee the Indians owned, then the Senator from Wisconsin ought not to have said it was fee simple, because it was not necessary to describe it. When I called his attention to the fact that it was not a fee simple, but that it was what the lawyers call a determinable or base fee, he then followed that other mistaken description of the fee which the Indians held with the still more startling proposition that the United States Government had no power to interfere with the governmental relations of the Indian tribes.

I stated to him at the time that I had not specially examined into the matter, but I ventured to dispute that assertion and thought I remembered more than one decision on it. I have here a leading case—that of The Cherokee Nation v. The Kansas Railway—in which the attorneys for the Indians sought to make the very contention which the Senator from Wisconsin now sanctions. The Government of the United States had authorized that railway company to exercise the great right of eminent domain. The Indians contested the exercise of that right, and alleged that the Federal Government had no power, either itself to take or authorize anybody else to enter that Territory and take its lands, which contention the Supreme Court very promptly and, as I think, very properly, overruled.

In the course of the decision they quoted the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the great case of the Cherokee Nation v. Georgia as establishing the absolute sovereignty of the United States over those Indian tribes. And again in the case of the United States v. Rogers, speaking again of this very Cherokee Nation, though not of the particular case of the Cherokee Nation against the Kansas Railway, the Supreme Court said:

It is true that it—

Meaning the land—

is occupied by the tribe of Cherokee Indians. But it has been assigned to them by the United States as a place of domicile for the tribe, and they hold and occupy it with the assent of the United States and under their authority. * * * We think it too firmly and clearly established to admit of dispute that the Indian tribes residing within the territorial limits of the United States are subject to their authority.

And what surprised me still more was that the very decision from which the Senator from Nevada had read, and which lay on the desk next to the Senator from Wisconsin, was a case establishing the constitutionality of a law which had interfered with the tribal government of those people.

But, Mr. President, it is a waste of time to argue that the United States has complete and ample power over the tribal relations, governmental and otherwise, of the Five Civilized Tribes. It is true enough that the United States have covenanted by more than one treaty that they will recognize certain of their rights, but it is equally true and equally well established that a law of Congress contrary to any treaty of the United States with the Indians or with foreign nations supersedes the treaty so far as the treaty and the law may conflict.

The Senator from Wisconsin asserted this denial of the power of the Government over those tribes as a support for the proposition advanced by the Senator from Nevada when he contended that the Government ought never to have enacted a law that attempted to interfere with the settlement of citizenship in the Indian tribes. I forgive the Senator from Nevada for making that statement, because the Senator from Nevada knows very little about conditions in the Indian Territory, though he must know something about the natural greed of the Indian.

To say that you will leave to a part of a tribe possessing valuable lands to be divided the power to determine the extent to which people outside, though entitled to be inside, shall participate in the division of that land is equivalent to asserting that it would be wise and just to allow the established heirs of any estate to decide the contest of those who claim a right to a division of it. The Senator from Nevada would not suggest that the legislature of his State should enact a law which declared that whenever an estate should be settled or divided the heirs in possession should be permitted to determine whether other heirs should come in for participation.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Texas allow me?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. The State of Nevada is constantly determining, by passing laws, who shall be citizens. If anybody undertook to determine the citizenship of the people of Nevada, it would be very hard. Each State has the right to determine the length of time persons shall reside in the State before they shall be citizens.

Mr. BAILEY. That used to be the law, but Nevada does not now determine who are citizens. The fourteenth amendment settled that.

Mr. STEWART. Nevada determines how long they shall remain there——

Mr. BAILEY. How long they shall remain there in order to be entitled to vote.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. They can vote without being citizens. It was once held that Nevada or any other State could determine the question of naturalization, the court originally holding that it was one of the concurrent powers; but that doctrine has long since been abandoned, and now all persons born or naturalized in Nevada are citizens of that State, and although Nevada should desire to make them other than citizens she could not do it.

Mr. STEWART. We can make them stay there one year or two years or five years.

Mr. BAILEY. Before they vote. But the Senator is unfortunate in using the word "citizenship" to describe the relationship of the members of those tribes. They are not citizens. They are members of the tribe.

Mr. STEWART. Ought not the tribes to determine who belong to their association?

Mr. BAILEY. That is a question of membership and not a question of citizenship.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator maintain that persons enjoying all the rights and privileges of citizens of and paying taxes in other States can be members of these tribes?

Mr. BAILEY. That is not my contention, nor is that the point we have in hand just now. I am insisting that the people of these tribes, already there, ought not to be permitted to determine who shall come in and share with them what belongs to the tribe. Whether people who have not resided in the Indian Territory and been members of this tribe should ever under any circumstances be permitted to share in a division of that estate is a question beyond the present controversy. The Congress of the United States decided that they were so entitled, and they have gone in under that law. In the beginning of this controversy no complaint was made against the law, and the only objection to the roll as now made up was that men by perjured testimony had brought themselves within the law.

When driven from that, then, the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Wisconsin now disclose that the real purpose is to repeal the law. They say Congress ought never to have enacted it, and they propose an amendment to it which practically nullifies it. The Senator from Wisconsin made it plain when he said that the law ought never to have been passed, and the Senator from Nevada agreed by nodding his assent. Indeed, the Senator from Wisconsin was merely repeating a statement already made by the Senator from Nevada, and they both declare that as Congress ought never to have passed the law it would be good policy to nullify it now by this amendment.

Mr. STEWART. It would be good policy to give the Indians a fair trial before three judges in order to have no injustice done in the matter.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is not more anxious to avoid injustice toward the Indians than I am. What does the Senator from Wisconsin say? He says that the two judges have held exactly crosswise with each other. He says that two brothers from Texas—by the way, I am very much surprised at the spitefulness of the repeated allusion of the Senator from Wisconsin to Texas people——

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. The lowest kind of argument is that which imputes an unworthy motive to an advocate of any cause.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish my statement. It is absolutely certain that I would be prompt to defend any right lawfully acquired by any citizen of Texas, though the Senator from Wisconsin ought to know that if these men hold their judgments they will cease to be citizens of Texas and become citizens of the Indian Territory. Indeed, I will go so far as to say that every man with a judgment entitling him to membership in those tribes is already in the Indian Territory and has removed from the State of Texas.

Mr. QUARLES. I must confess to some surprise, Mr. President, that my distinguished friend the Senator from Texas is not willing to accept the disclaimer which I promptly made on the floor the moment the suggestion was made that I was disparaging the Senator or imputing to him any improper motive. I am surprised that my distinguished friend is not gracious enough to accept my disclaimer; and if it requires another assertion of the proposition, I claim the right to say now that I had not the remotest idea or thought of suggesting that my friend had done anything that was not entirely proper or that he had any improper connection with these people or anything else. There was nothing of the kind in my mind.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, I do not for a moment imagine that the Senator would impute to me any improper connection, because that is a statement that no Senator would make with respect to me. But what I complained about was that the Senator constantly repeated the statement as to these lawyers from Texas and these people from Texas, thereby insinuating to the Senate that I had other than the mere legal objections to it. I will say the Senator is not more surprised that I did not accept his disclaimer than I was in his repeated talk about these people who came from Texas. I tell the Senator now that as often as a man goes from Texas to the Indian Territory he improves the citizenship of that Territory, and the same could be said of Wisconsin just as well as of the Indian Territory.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin, as I was proceeding to say, said two brothers might come from Texas with the identical facts in each case. One might apply for admission under one judge, the other might apply for admission under the other judge. and yet upon the identical facts, he said, one brother might be admitted as a member of the tribe and another might be excluded. Grant it. Then what is the arrangement? One brother having been excluded and the other brother having been admitted, the arrangement is, if this new court shall hold that the judge had erred in the case, admitting one brother, that admitted brother shall be excluded. But it is nowhere provided that the brother who was wrongfully excluded by the other judge is permitted to appeal from his decision.

The result will be—and that is the purpose of it, as was made plain by both the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Nevada—and the result will be that large numbers of these people will go off of that roll upon a pure question of law, and thus they abandon the charge of wholesale perjury and fraud, because they now believe that they can carry their measure through the Senate by proclaiming its real purpose; which is, that they intend by an amendment to the law to destroy a law which they say ought never to have been enacted. That is the purpose of it. That is the avowed object of it.

Mr. President. it is difficult for me to characterize in temperate language the effort to make it appear that everybody in the Indian Territory who has been connected with these cases is a rascal, lawyers included. That there are rascals there practicing law I have no doubt. There are in every State rascals in every vocation. But in the main the young men who have gone to the Indian Territory to practice their profession are ambitious, vigorous, straightforward, and honorable. They have not gone there, it is true, for their health, nor for the society.

They have gone there with the deliberate purpose (denying themselves the comforts and conveniences that exist in older civilizations) of improving their condition. But nearly all of those whom I have the pleasure to know have the wisdom to understand that no man in the end ever improves his condition by practicing dishonesty. I believe that the bar of the Indian Territory will compare favorably with the bar of almost any State in the Union, numbers considered. As a neighbor of theirs, having no lot or parcel with them, never expecting to be closer than a neighbor, I desire in this high place to protest against the stigma which it has been sought to affix upon their name.

I do not know who the referees were, except in the one case to which I have already alluded, but I do not believe, and I will never believe without something like a definite assertion and proof, that any judge of the United States holding court in the Indian Territory would appoint as his referees attorneys who practice in the very cases which they are to decide. That there were referees, and that the referees disposed of the preliminary work in many of these cases, I am sure is true; but if that is calculated to raise a presumption against the honesty of these judgments, that same presumption would be raised against the judgments of almost every State in this Union, and especially among the older States.

I undertake to say that to-day in the great State of New York more of the work of every court there is done by referees than is the case in the Indian Territory. Even if it happens that a referee in this case should hereafter become interested in a similar case, I would hesitate a long time before I would say that he decided the case referred to him in expectation of a benefit in the decision of the case where he was a lawyer. And yet it is necessary to this argument that this cloud of doubt and suspicion shall be made to involve the lawyers in that Territory.

The Senator from Wisconsin exhibits a list of two hundred and odd names which he says were improperly interpolated in one of these judgments, and affirms that this fraud would have become fixed if the Dawes Commission had not found and exposed the wrong. If the Dawes Commission served that useful purpose, I am glad to know that it has made at least some effort to earn the salary which the members have been drawing for almost ten years for work that ought to have been done in five.

But as a matter of fact, the Dawes Commission did not discover that mistake, unless my information is widely at fault, because before the Senator from Wisconsin ever exhibited that paper I had heard of this particular case, or at least I had heard of a particular case. As I recall it, it did not include any 267 names, but it included a large number that had been fraudulently inserted in the judgment, and the judge of the court himself and of his own motion struck them out.

It is, sir, a strange conclusion to draw, that because a fraudulent attempt was detected and prevented, therefore every judgment of the court shall be tainted with suspicion. If, as a matter of fact, fraud of that kind should be attempted in a court and should be defeated, I would consider that a circumstance strongly tending to establish the diligence and attention of that court rather than to cast suspicion upon its proceedings.

Mr. President, I see that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] desires to submit a conference report, and I yield for that purpose.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 18, 20, and 21.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 16, 17, 19, 22, 24, and 25; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "all" in line 4, page 22 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and an inspection;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert "promptly;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On the amendments of the Senate numbered 14 and 15 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

MONUMENT TO GEN. HUGH MERCER.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] must leave the city, and I yield to him for a matter which he has in hand.

Mr. DANIEL. I thank the Senator from Texas, and the Senator from Nevada also, who have kindly consented to yield to me for a brief time.

I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10933) to provide for the erection, at Fredericksburg, Va., of the monument to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, which it was ordered by Congress on the 8th day of April, 1777, should be erected.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield if it does not lead to extended debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read, and the amendment of the Committee on the Library has been agreed to. Are there further amendments as in Committee of the Whole?

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the erection at Fredericksburg, Va., of the monument to the memory of Gen. Hugh Mercer, which was ordered by Congress on the 8th day of April, 1777, should be erected."

The preamble was agreed to.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. NELSON. By the consent of the Senator from Texas, who kindly yields to me, I report back from the Committee on Commerce the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1026) to fix the compensation of district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service. The committee agrees to the amendment, and I ask that it be read and concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5 strike out the words "two thousand dollars per annum each" and insert:

as follows: For the superintendents of the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth districts, $2,000 per annum each; for the superintendents of the third and ninth districts, $1,800 per annum each; for the superintendent of the eighth district, $1,700.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate agree to the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN SAN DIEGO COUNTY, CAL.

Mr. BARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BARD. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6148) providing for the resurvey of certain townships in San Diego County, Cal.

Mr. STEWART. I do not yield to have the Choctaw-treaty bill lose its place.

Mr. BARD. This bill will take but a moment.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS AGAINST COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in further response to the Senate's resolution of May 15, 1900, requesting copies of all correspondence and papers in regard to claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Colombia growing out of the withdrawal of the military forces and police from Colon by that Government and the firing of the city by insurgents in 1885.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 23, 1902.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. DIETRICH. The Senator from Texas yields to me that I may call up the bill (H. R. 14691) to authorize the construction of a pontoon bridge across the Missouri River, in the county of Cass, in the State of Nebraska, and in the county of Mills, in the State of Iowa.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LANDS AND BUILDINGS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14244) authorizing the President to reserve public lands and buildings in the island of Porto Rico for public uses, and granting other public lands and buildings to the government of Porto Rico.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 7, after the words "marine hospital," to insert "post-offices, custom-houses, United States courts;" in line 11, before the word "owned," to insert "and the submerged land underlying the same;" and on page 2, line 9, after the word "act," to insert:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to affect any legal or equitable rights acquired by the government of Porto Rico or by any other party, under any contract, lease, or license made by the United States authorities prior to the 1st day of May, 1900.

So as to make the section read:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to make, within one year after the approval of this act, such reservation of public lands and buildings belonging to the United States in the island of Porto Rico, for military, naval, light-house, marine-hospital, post-offices, custom-houses, United States courts, and other public purposes, as he may deem necessary, and all the public lands and buildings, not including harbor areas and navigable streams and bodies of water and the submerged lands underlying the same, owned by the United States in said island and not so reserved be, and the same are hereby, granted to the government of Porto Rico, to be held or disposed of for the use and benefit of the people of said island: Provided, That said grant is upon the express condition that the government of Porto Rico, by proper authority, release to the United States any interest or claim it may have in or upon the lands or buildings reserved by the President under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to affect any legal or equitable rights acquired by the government of Porto Rico or by any other party, under any contract, lease, or license made by the United States authorities prior to the 1st day of May, 1900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 14, to insert:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to have a survey made of the harbor of San Juan, and of the other principal ports of Porto Rico, with a view to increasing anchorage areas and harbor facilities, to prepare estimates of the cost of work considered necessary in the interest of commerce and navigation, and to make due report thereof to Congress; the expense of such surveys to be paid for from the appropriation for examination, surveys, and contingencies provided by section 2 of the river and harbor act of June 13, 1902.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 24, to insert:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the clerk of the district court of the United States for Porto Rico, under the supervision and subject to the approval of the presiding judge of said court, in the purchase of a law library for the use of said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 6, to insert:

SEC. 4. That the resident commissioner from Porto Rico to the United States, provided for by section 39 of the act of April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right to debate but not to vote, and shall be entitled to the same compensation for salary and other allowances, and to the same rights and privileges as the Delegates from the Territories of the United States, and his term of office shall commence on the 4th day of March next succeeding the date of his election; and the term of office of the present incumbent is hereby extended to the 3d day of March, 1903.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the bill before the Senate or is it just being read for unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendments of the committee are being acted on.

Mr. SPOONER. By unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to debate the provision for a delegate from Porto Rico. I was not aware that it was in the bill. When was the bill reported?

Mr. FORAKER. I thought the Senator was aware of it.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not.

Mr. FORAKER. We do not make him a delegate. The resident commissioner is still the resident commissioner. He retains the name. He is given a seat on the floor of the House of Representatives, however. I of course do not want to cut off any debate. I suppose I was in error in so understanding, but I understood that the Senator would not object to it if we did not change the name.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not read it. I did not know there was any such provision in the bill. I wish the Senator would let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well, if the Senator wishes.

Mr. SPOONER. I would be glad if he would let it take that course.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well. Let it be read for information all the way through.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 19, to insert:

SEC. 5. That all the applicable provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States shall apply to and be held to authorize the admission to citizenship of all persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, and who may become residents of any State or organized Territory of the United States with the following modifications: The applicant shall not be required to renounce allegiance to any foreign sovereignty; he shall make his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States at least one year prior to his admission; and residence within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing such permanent allegiance, shall be regarded as residence within the United States within the meaning of the five years' residence clause of the existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the bill is laid aside for the day, I will suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that the last provision is entirely separate from the one to which he took exception. It simply provides for the granting of naturalization papers to people who live in our insular possessions. As the law now stands no one can be naturalized in accordance with the statutes until he forswears allegiance to some foreign sovereignty; and as there is no such foreign sovereignty for any one of those inhabitants to forswear his allegiance to, this bill simply corrects the law in that particular. I hope there will be no objection to that, but that the amendment may be considered adopted, and the bill then go over as to the other amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator filled the blank section 2 in regard to the date?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I have filled the blank.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then all the sections will be considered as agreed to except the one to which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] objected.

Mr. FORAKER. And that section goes over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That goes over.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Are there not two sections that relate to the matter of a delegate?

Mr. FORAKER. If there are two, then both will go over.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I ask that both go over relating to the delegate.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose if the bill goes over it takes all the sections with it.

Mr. FORAKER. Of course the bill goes over, but these sections have been adopted. When the bill is again called up I will ask that the two sections objected to may be considered and acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE NEAR CANEY CREEK.

Mr. BATE. I ask the Senator from Texas to yield to me for the consideration of a bill that will not excite debate.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BATE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14111) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River, in the State of Tennessee, by the Harriman Southern Railroad Company.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECORDING OF DEEDS, ETC., IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Texas to yield to me for the consideration of a bill which I am anxious to have considered.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5678) providing for record of deeds and other conveyances and instruments of writing in Indian Territory, and for other purposes. It is a bill to put in force the laws of Arkansas in the Indian Territory as to the execution and recording of deeds, mortgages, etc. It is a bill to which there will be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are certain committee amendments proposed, which I ask may be considered in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "chapter," to strike out "126" and insert "27;" in line 6, after the word "Territory," to insert "so far as the same may be applicable and not inconsistent with any law of Congress;" in line 8, after the word "clerk," to insert "or deputy clerk;" in line 9, before the word "courts," to strike out "district;" on page 2, line 1, before the word "office," to strike out "principal;" and in the same line, after the word "clerk," to insert "or deputy clerk;" so as to read:

That chapter 27 of the Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, known as Mansfield's Digest of 1884, is hereby extended to the Indian Territory, so far as the same may be applicable and not inconsistent with any law of Congress: Provided, That the clerk or deputy clerk of the United States court of each of the courts of said Territory shall be ex officio recorder for his district and perform the duties required of recorder in the chapter aforesaid, and use the seal of such court in cases requiring a seal, and keep the records of such office at the office of said clerk or deputy clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "clerk," to insert "or deputy clerk;" and in line 10, after the word "filing," to insert "for the period of twelve months from the filing thereof;" so as to make the clause read:

It shall be the duty of each clerk or deputy clerk of such court to record in the books provided for his office all deeds, mortgages, deeds of trust, bonds, leases, covenants, defeasances, bills of sale, and other instruments of writing of or concerning lands, tenements, goods, or chattels; and where such instruments are for a period of time limited on the face of the instrument they shall be filed and indexed, if desired by the holder thereof, and such filing for the period of twelve months from the filing thereof shall have the same effect in law as if recorded at length. The fees for filing, indexing, and cross indexing such instruments shall be 25 cents, and for recording shall be as set forth in section 3243 of Mansfield's Digest of 1884.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out from line 17 to line 19, inclusive, on page 2, as follows:

All fees received for recording instruments provided for in this act shall be accounted for to the Secretary of the Treasury as other fees are.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the said clerk or deputy clerk of such court shall receive as compensation as such ex officio recorder for his district all fees received by him for recording instruments provided for in this act, amounting to $1,800 per annum or less; and all fees so received by him as aforesaid amounting to more than the sum of $1,800 per annum shall be accounted to the Department of Justice, to be applied to the permanent school fund of the district in which said court is located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 9, to insert:

That wherever in said chapter the word "county" occurs there shall be substituted therefor the word "district," and wherever the words "State" or "State of Arkansas" occur there shall be substituted therefor the words "Indian Territory," and wherever the words "clerk" or "recorder" occur there shall be substituted the words "clerk or deputy clerk of the United States court."

All acknowledgments of deeds of conveyance taken within the Indian Territory shall be taken before a clerk or deputy clerk of any of the courts in said Territory, a United States commissioner, or a notary public appointed in and for said Territory.

All instruments of writing the filing of which is provided for by law shall be recorded or filed in the office of the clerk or deputy clerk at the place of holding court in the recording district where said property may be located, and which said recording districts are bounded as follows:

District No. 1 shall comprise all of the reservations heretofore existing under the Quapaw Agency, and the place of record shall be at Miami, as provided in the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

Beginning at a point where range line between ranges 15 and 16 east intersects the township line between townships 1 and 2 north; thence south along said line to its intersection with township line between townships 2 and 3 south; thence west along said line to range line between ranges 14 and 15 east; thence south on said line to the Red River; thence down Red River, following the meanderings thereof, to the eastern boundary of the Indian Territory; thence north along said eastern boundary line of the Indian Territory to intersection with the base line; thence west along said line to the meridian line between ranges 20 and 21 east; thence north to township line between townships 2 and 3 north; thence west along said line to range line between ranges 18 and 19 east; thence south on said line to township line between townships 1 and 2 north; thence west on said line to point of beginning. The place of record for district No. 24 shall be Antlers.

District No. 25. Beginning at a point on the western boundary line of the Choctaw Nation where it intersects the township line between townships 3 and 4 south; thence east along said line to range line between ranges 14 and 15 east; thence south on said line to the Red River; thence up said Red River, following the meanderings thereof, to the mouth of the Washita River; thence up said Washita River to the mouth of Butcherpen Creek; thence north up said Butcherpen Creek to the township line between townships 4 and 5 south, in range 7 east; thence east along said township line to the boundary line between the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations; thence north on said boundary line to the point of beginning. The place of record for district No. 25 shall be Durant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANCY J. M'ARTHUR.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask the Senator from Texas to yield to me.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 14221) granting an increase of pension to Nancy J. McArthur. The bill simply proposes to grant an increase of pension to a very old lady.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "Regiment," to strike out "A, Fourteenth" and insert "G, Seventy-first;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy J. McArthur, widow of James R. McArthur, late captain of Company G, Seventy-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JAMES F. M'INDOE.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me a moment for the consideration of a very short bill?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5531) for the relief of James F. McIndoe.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James F. McIndoe, captain, Corps of Engineers, late first lieutenant, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, $1,142.70, being the value of his personal effects destroyed by fire on the 13th of February, 1901, through the destruction by fire of the engineer quarters at Fort Hancock, N. J., as determined by a board of survey which met by order of Major-General Brooke at Fort Hancock, N. J., on the 15th of March, 1901.

Mr. BATE. From what committee does that bill come?

Mr. McCOMAS. It has been reported by a committee. The personal effects of this man were burned while he was trying to save Government property. There was a board appointed by General Brooke, and they say it is a most meritorious case.

Mr. BATE. My inquiry was as to what committee had reported the bill.

Mr. McCOMAS. The Committee on Claims, through the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], reported the bill unanimously.

Mr. SPOONER. What was this man an officer of?

Mr. McCOMAS. He was a captain in the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. SPOONER. For what are we paying him?

Mr. McCOMAS. We are paying him for the destruction of his personal effects by fire on the 13th of February, 1901, in the engineer quarters at Fort Hancock, N. J. While he was engaged in saving Government buildings, his own property was burned up. The board passed upon the claim, and held that it was entirely proper.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPOONER. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which that bill was passed, and I ask that the motion may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

EXPENDITURES FOR BUILDINGS IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. BERRY. With the permission of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4556) to amend an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, and so forth," approved March 3, 1901.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read in full for the information of the Senate, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1901, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, etc.," be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the proceeds of the sales of town lots in the towns of Lawton, Comanche County; Anadarko, Caddo County, and Hobart, Kiowa County, in the Territory of Oklahoma, heretofore had pursuant to the authority of the act aforesaid, to cause to be expended, subject to his control and supervision and upon the recommendation of the legally constituted authorities of each of said towns, for the construction of public waterworks, schoolhouses, and such other municipal improvements as may be advisable and advantageous to the inhabitants of said towns, the following additional sums, to wit: For the town of Lawton, $150,000; for the town of Anadarko, $30,000, and for the town of Hobart, $50,000: Provided further, That the sum of $10,000, as provided in the act whereof this is amendatory, for the construction of a county court-house in each of the towns aforesaid, shall be, and hereby is, increased to the sum of $30,000 each for the construction of such county court-houses in each town."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. From what committee does the bill come?

Mr. BERRY. It comes from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Are there any county court-houses there?

Mr. BERRY. It is a House bill. There is a House report with it. The old bill provided that a certain amount of money for which town lots were sold in these towns in Oklahoma might be used for all these purposes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not make any objection.

Mr. BERRY. The bill is all right.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from California yield to me to enter a motion?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to give notice of a motion to reconsider the votes by which the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4284) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, and requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and I move that the bill be recalled from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House amendments to the bill indicated by him were disagreed to and a conference asked, and he moves to recall the bill with the message touching a conference. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. QUARLES subsequently said: I wish to ask permission to correct something that took place inadvertently. My distinguished friend the Senator from Minnesota notified me that he intended to give notice simply of a motion to recall a bill from the House, to be called up to-morrow, if found desirable at that time. I did not understand that we were called upon to consent that the motion should be considered and passed upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was not considered and passed upon. The motion to recall the bill from the House is a necessary accompaniment of the entering of a motion to reconsider. The motion to reconsider was not acted upon. It was only the motion to recall the bill from the House,

Mr. QUARLES. Very well. I misunderstood it.

JAMES M. OLMSTEAD.

Mr. PERKINS. By the kind permission of the Senator from Texas, for which he has my thanks, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 13650) to correct the military record of James M. Olmstead.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the military record of James M. Olmstead so as to fix September 8, 1863, as the actual date of his discharge from the service as second lieutenant Company F, Eleventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, the same being the date to which he was paid and upon which his service terminated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is necessary to have an executive session this evening, and I should like to inquire of the Senator from Texas to how many more Senators he has agreed to yield?

Mr. BAILEY. These interruptions are about at an end. I am under agreement to yield to three more gentlemen who have small, short bills which they wish to have considered. I think they can all be disposed of in a very few moments, and then I will yield.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The thing might go on all night.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I shall not yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. FORAKER. Before we pass from this, I wish to ask the Senator from Texas to include me in the number. I have a brief bill which I should like to have considered.

Mr. BAILEY. I can not resist——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Connecticut has not the floor for the purpose of making that motion. I decline to yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I rise to a point of order, and that is that the Senator from Texas can not hold the floor upon the bill which was under consideration and yield to Senators all over the Chamber to pass bills. If he has the floor, he must hold it on the bill upon which he took it.

Mr. BAILEY. The question to whom a Senator shall yield when he has the floor is for him to determine. I am perfectly free to say that these interruptions have not been disagreeable to me. The Senate would have adjourned, but I agreed to yield to a number of Senators having small local bills in which they are interested and which they desired to pass, and I do not believe I was abusing the privileges or misusing the time of the Senate. If the Senator from Connecticut imagines he can determine how often and to whom a Senator, once having the floor, shall yield, I think he will find no warrant for it in the rules, and I decline to yield to the Senator from Connecticut for the purpose of moving an executive session.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I rise for the purpose of making a point of order, and that is, that when the unfinished business is under discussion and a Senator has the floor, he has no right to yield to other Senators for the purpose of passing bills. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, it is a custom which never has prevailed in the Senate for a Senator to yield in order that other bills might be taken up for consideration. It is not in the Senate as it is in the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I know it is not, of course. In the House a member's time is limited to one hour. If he chooses to occupy that one hour in any way, he may do so. Here we have no limitation of time.

I am not going to appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I want to serve notice that if that rule is to be enforced no Senator who has the floor to make a speech will yield to any other Senator to make a request for unanimous consent so long as I serve in this body.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will join with the Senator from Texas in trying to enforce that rule.

Mr. BAILEY. I am going to see that the Senate does it; and I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that he has to-day yielded to eight or ten different Senators to pass bills. It would not do for the Senate to put into the hands of one Senator the power to control every bill which might be considered. That is a matter to be left to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not want to see either the rule or the practice of the Senate render that possible. My contention is that when the Senate itself sees fit it can control it by rule. Up to this time it has not seen fit to control it by rule. A Senator having the floor, with his sense of duty and his respect for his fellow-Senators, must not abuse that privilege. I have myself, in my brief service here, seen many Senators yield two, three, and four times. Now, shall a Senator yield two, three, and four times, and not yield six or eight?

Mr. HALE. Let me say right here, if the Senator will yield for a moment——

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will insist upon enforcing this rule in the future. The importunities of Senators have come to be a great impediment in the way of doing business. I have no doubt I myself have done so, although I ought not to have done it. When a Senator is upon the floor, and when the regular order is his speech, where he has been recognized by the Chair, that is the business before the Senate. Yet one Senator after another appeals to the Senator to yield to allow him to pass a bill. The Senate at any time has the right, and it ought to insist upon it, and a single Senator at any time has the right, by calling for the regular order, and he ought to insist upon it, to demand that that shall not be done. If I have been recognized by the Chair and am addressing the Senate upon any subject, or if the Senator from Texas has been recognized and has the floor, and the Senator from Ohio or from Colorado asks him or me to yield, any Senator can call for the regular order and the Senator can not yield, but must go on with his speech. It ought to be insisted upon more often than it is.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to make a suggestion right here? The Senate has another way of protecting itself from any abuse such as has been suggested. When a Senator having the floor yields to another Senator, who requests unanimous consent for the consideration of any bill, any Senator can object.

Mr. BAILEY. He can object to its consideration.

Mr. FORAKER. He can object, and put a stop to it.

Mr. HALE. We all know that; but two things are true here: The easiest thing to do is to get unanimous consent. The hardest thing to get done is to get a Senator to object to a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is to the credit of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that it has been decided in the Senate quite a number of times—the present occupant of the chair knows that Vice-President Morton so decided—that no Senator can hold the floor and yield it without himself first obtaining unanimous consent to yield; and when the regular order of business is called for, that is an objection to yielding.

Mr. HALE. That settles it.

Mr. BAILEY. If that has been the decision of the Senate heretofore, I withdraw the appeal. I have no desire myself to infract the rules of the Senate, and I believe I am the only Senator against whom I see them regularly invoked. I think this is the third time. Therefore I will modify my statement that I will invoke the rules against everybody else, and I will reserve my right to exercise selection in that respect, and I will invoke them when I think they ought to be invoked.

Mr. TELLER. For the purpose of saying a word, I wish to take an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, so that I may not be taken off the floor.

The course pursued by the Senator from Texas has been in vogue in the Senate for a quarter of a century to my certain knowledge, not, perhaps, that a Senator has yielded to so many as has been the case to-night. There has never been a session when it has not been done and repeatedly done. Of course, any Senator has a right, when the proceeding goes beyond what he thinks is proper, to call for the regular order. The Senator then must cease. He can no longer yield. He can resume the floor and proceed, if he sees fit. If he does not, he must yield the floor.

The Senator from Connecticut assumes that this is something unusual. I do not know to how many Senators the Senator from Texas has yielded, but I think he said five or six.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Eight.

Mr. TELLER. Eight, perhaps. They have little bills which can be taken up and passed in a moment, and it is the most expeditious way of doing business that anybody can imagine. It has never been abused in the Senate, and while it is not asserted as a right, and I have occasionally heard a call for the regular order, it is rare. The Senator from Connecticut is anxious to get an executive session. If he had waited a moment and yielded to two or three gentlemen who have little bills that could be passed on reading, we might have been in executive session now.

The beauty of service in the Senate is that by a little concession to each other we proceed and do more business in the same length of time than any other legislative body in the world ever did. The Senator does not expedite business by coming here with a technical question just now. Suppose I concluded that he should not have an executive session. He could not get through with it to-night. I should be able to talk until 12 o'clock easy enough on this appeal. [Laughter.] I am not going to do it, Mr. President.

I do not mean to say that I do not think the ruling of the Chair is perfectly proper under the circumstances, but I do not think it was exactly the thing for the Senator from Connecticut to raise this question when he knew there was no intention on the part of the Senator from Texas to take advantage of anybody or to prevent him from having an executive session in a few moments. I tried to get the floor to appeal to the Senator to let the three or four bills that Senators wanted to call up, and which would have taken but a minute apiece, be passed.

Mr. President, I wish to withdraw the appeal.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word in justice to myself.

Mr. TELLER. I will not withdraw the appeal until the Senator from Texas gets through.

Mr. BAILEY. It was understood between the Senator from Nevada and myself that it was impossible to conclude the consideration of the Indian bill this afternoon. Not desiring myself to monopolize the floor nor yet desiring to yield the floor at just that particular time, I yielded to various requests on the part of gentlemen who had bills which they wished to call up. I tried to be as impartial as possible in my agreements to yield, yielding to gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber. I was proceeding in a way that I thought accommodated the greatest number of Senators, without any thought of abusing the privilege of the Senate, and without any thought that the rule was going to be invoked, for I stated to the Senator from Connecticut, who walked across the aisle and asked me about it, that when I had kept three more agreements to yield I was through and would yield for a motion to go into executive session. I simply want it to appear in the RECORD that I was not retaining the floor for any purpose of my own, but in pursuance of an understanding with the Senator from Nevada in regard to the bill then under consideration, that it would go over until to-morrow. These things, I think, could have been well and properly done without this point. The Chair having decided that it is not in order for me to yield, I submit.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. For the purpose of justifying myself, if I can, in the estimation of my good friends from Colorado and Texas, I should like to state how this matter occurred. I rose and asked the Senator from Texas to how many more Senators he had promised to yield. Perhaps I had no right to do so. I got a very indefinite reply. I said in the first place that I desired and hoped we might have a short executive session. Getting that indefinite reply——

Mr. BAILEY. Do I understand the Senator from Connecticut to say that I made him an indefinite reply?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I certainly understood so.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, the Senator did not understand me. I told him three more.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, that was when we were talking about it between ourselves.

Mr. BAILEY. It happened just a moment before you made the point, and fearing that I was mistaken I asked the Senator from Colorado, who heard me, and he confirms me in my own belief that I said to the Senator there were three more.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When I asked the question——

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; when I asked the question in the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I remember distinctly that when the Senator from Connecticut asked the question in open Senate the Senator from Texas made that reply. I remember it, because I then rose and asked the Senator from Texas to add me to the three if I was not included.

Mr. BAILEY. That is right. I did not intend to be indefinite, and I am sure the Senator from Connecticut misunderstood me.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The RECORD will show to-morrow who is right and who is not.

Mr. BAILEY. What occurred here was between us and will not appear in the RECORD, I take it, because it was private.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not at all. But the Senator's reply to my question when I asked him how many more Senators he had agreed to yield to will be found in the RECORD, and I will leave it to the RECORD whether it was an indefinite reply or whether it was a reply that he had agreed to yield to three Senators. I then said that I would move an executive session, and the Senator said I could not get the floor to do it. Then I made the point of order that he was not entitled to the floor for the purpose of yielding it to Senators to pass bills. That was the way the matter occurred. I trust I have not ruffled the feelings of my friends on the other side.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I did not know how many promises the Senator from Texas had outstanding, because I was not over there to talk with him privately, except by his statement in open Senate, but I remember distinctly that he said three, and thereupon I appealed to him to include me, as I had a short bill for which I desired to ask unanimous consent.

However, that is not the important thing I want to say. We are making a ruling and establishing a precedent, and I want to confirm what the Senator from Colorado has said that ever since I have been a member of the Senate what the Senator from Texas has done has been indulged in more or less until some Senator saw fit to make an objection.

I do not see how it is possible to abuse the privileges of the Senate in that way, because, as has been suggested, whenever a Senator is appealed to to yield and does yield, and the Senator to whom he has yielded asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, it is within the power of any Senator to stop the proceeding right there by making an objection or calling for the regular order; and until some one does make objection or call for the regular order, which is only another way of making objection, it is entirely in order for the Senator having the floor, according to the practice here as I have observed it, to yield to a Senator who wants to have a bill considered or to yield to a Senator who wants to present morning business out of order. He must always ask unanimous consent, and whatever the Senate gives unanimous consent for is in order at all times, as I understand it. Whenever a Senator objects, then of course it is in order for the Chair to sustain the objection, but until he does it is in order, because the Senate agrees to it. I agree with the Senator from Colorado that this is an expeditious way of cleaning up the business that the Senate ought to transact.

Now, we have a great many bills that have been accumulating during the session. I have two or three and I have been awaiting an opportunity when I could present them without interfering with the business of the Senate. This seemed to be an opportune time and I was hoping I might present some of them and get them out of the way. They are measures which ought to be passed. But, of course, under all the circumstances I withdraw the request I made to the Senator. I would not presume to insist upon it as a right. Certainly I would have a right to insist upon it if the Senate gave unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator does not understand the Chair to rule any differently from what he has stated?

Mr. FORAKER. No; but some Senators have made remarks which seem to indicate that they did. I understood the ruling of the Chair to be precisely what I have contended for.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, I think he sustains the ruling of the Chair and also vindicates the Senator from Texas.

Mr. FORAKER. I was trying to do both.

Mr. SCOTT. It is late, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that we may have a brief executive session.

Mr. SCOTT. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. Let me withdraw my appeal. I desire to withdraw the appeal I made from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 24, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 23, 1902.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

DAM ACROSS RAINY RIVER.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3375) relating to the construction of a dam across Rainy River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the construction of a dam across the Rainy River by the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, as provided by chapter 238 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large and chapter 346 of volume 31 of the Statutes at Large, is hereby extended to May 4, 1907.

SEC. 2. That the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to construct and maintain said dam, subject to the terms of said chapter 238 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large, upon the plans now on file with the Secretary of War, or any modification of said plans which the Secretary of War may approve; and the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to construct such dam at such height as will raise the waters of Rainy Lake to high-water mark: Provided, That said dam shall be furnished with such openings or gates or waste ways as will carry the waters of the river at flood stage without raising the water higher than it would rise in the natural condition of the stream: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as relieving the Koochiching Company, its successors or assigns, from liability for any damage inflicted upon private property by reason of the raising of the waters of the lake as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COLLECTION DISTRICT AND PORT OF ENTRY, MONTANA AND IDAHO.

Mr. EDWARDS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3746) to amend section 2593 of the Revised Statutes, relating to ports of entry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2593, Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2593. There shall be in the States of Montana and Idaho one collection district, as follows:

"The district of Montana and Idaho to comprise the States of Montana and Idaho, and the port of entry shall be Great Falls, Mont."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNSKILLED LABORERS IN CENSUS OFFICE.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for immediate consideration the bill (S. 6178) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting, after the word "watchmen," and before the words "and charwomen," where the same occur in said section 4, the words "unskilled laborers."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask what will be the effect of this bill if passed? It does not appear on its face.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In the bill approved March 6 last for a permanent Census Office the words "unskilled laborers" were inadvertently omitted from the class of employees that the Director of the Census was authorized to appoint. When he came to make a permanent organization of the force, to begin with the 1st of July, he found that the act did not authorize him to employ any unskilled laborers. There are between twenty and thirty of such employees in the Bureau now, and that many will be required in future. The Director of the Census submitted to the Attorney-General the question whether he could not under the head of "watchmen or messengers" employ the requisite force of unskilled laborers. The Attorney-General reported that he could not. This bill, which proposes to insert in section 4 of the act to which I have referred the words "unskilled laborers," was passed by the Senate some days ago and has been held on the Speaker's table in order that it might be called up. It simply proposes to remedy the omission I have stated and to authorize the Director of the Census to employ the usual quota of unskilled laborers as a part of the necessary force of the Bureau. That is all there is of it.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRUMPACKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DUPLICATE CERTIFICATES OF DISCHARGE.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 97) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish duplicate certificates of discharge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever satisfactory proof shall be furnished to the War Department that any officer or enlisted man who has been or shall hereafter be honorably discharged from the military service of the United States has lost his certificate of discharge, or the same has been destroyed without his privity or procurement, the Secretary of War shall be authorized to furnish to such officer or enlisted man, or to the widow of such officer or enlisted man, a duplicate of such certificate of discharge, to be indelibly marked, so that it may be known as a duplicate: Provided, That such certificate shall not be accepted as a voucher for the payment of any claim against the United States for pay, bounty, or allowance, or as evidence in any other case.

Mr. HULL. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask one question. I understand that the only change which this bill makes in the law is to provide for duplicate certificates instead of certified copies.

Mr. HAY. That is all.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DUTIABLE MERCHANDISE AT TACOMA AND SEATTLE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11987) relating to transportation of dutiable merchandise at subports of Tacoma and Seattle, State of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and the same are hereby, extended to Tacoma and Seattle, subports of entry in the customs collection district of Puget Sound, State of Washington.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MEDALS FOR OFFICERS OF REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to bestow medals upon First Lieut.

David H. Jarvis, Second Lieut. Ellsworth T. Bertholf, and Samuel J. Call, all of the Revenue-Cutter Service, which I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to bestow a gold medal of honor, of such design as he may approve, upon First Lieut. David H. Jarvis, Second Lieut. Ellsworth P. Bertholf, and Dr. Samuel J. Call, surgeon, all of the Revenue-Cutter Service and members of the overland expedition of 1897 and 1898 for the relief of the whaling fleet in the artic regions, in recognition of the heroic service rendered by them in connection with said expedition.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purchase or manufacture of said medals, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has just read. Is there objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COWHERD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands the regular order, which is the consideration of the bill S. 2295, the Philippine government bill.

CERTAIN DISBURSEMENTS IN CUBA.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, before we go into Committee of the Whole I desire to submit a privileged resolution, which will probably take not more than a couple of minutes to dispose of.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia withhold his demand for the regular order?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I withhold my demand.

Mr. HULL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, the following information:

What amounts, if any, have been paid out of the Cuban treasury or the funds of the Cuban people by the military governor of Cuba, or by his direction, or by any officer of the United States, while the forces of the United States occupied Cuba, to F. B. Thurber, president of the United States Export Association, or any other person or persons, corporation, or association for advocating a reduction in the duties upon Cuban products, with a reciprocal reduction in the duties upon American products imported into Cuba, or for services in support of the application of the inhabitants of the island of Cuba for reciprocal relations with the United States; also the date or dates of any such payments.

The following report was read by the clerk:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House resolution No. 304, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the continuing order of the House, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2295, the Philippine government bill, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2295, the Philippine government bill, with Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts in the chair.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, there are many acts and incidents connected with our occupation of the Philippine Islands and our relations to the Filipinos which are in themselves very interesting, and which no doubt have great bearing upon the questions now before the House and the country. There are various legal and constitutional phases of these questions involved, which have been discussed with much learning and much zeal, and they, too, are very important. In a comparatively short time one could not possibly make what would be to himself or to anyone who might honor him with a hearing a satisfactory argument based upon these various acts and incidents or these legal and constitutional matters.

There are a few things, it seems to me, that are greatly misapprehended by some people. Some are very fond of indulging in the repetition of a phrase about the Constitution following the flag. As I understand it, the contention upon this side has been and still is, and I think will continue to be, that the Constitution must control the Congress of the United States in its every act, and all the officers of the United States in all their operations, wherever they may be.

Something like that, I think, is a very much more accurate and comprehensive statement of our understanding and contention than any phrase in regard to the Constitution and the flag. We have contended and still contend, and I hope always contend, that it is not in the power of the Congress or of the President to rightfully do anything except under and pursuant to the Constitution; that wherever the power of the United States Government extends, no matter what officer of the Government, high or low, exercises power, that power must be controlled and directed, and that officer must be restrained and guided by the letter and the principles and the spirit of the Federal Constitution.

No doubt many instances can be found—too many, I am sorry to say—where cruelties and outrages have been perpetrated upon those who are helpless and defenseless. The responsibility for these ought to be traced. It ought to be put where it belongs, and those who have violated the law, whether it be our ordinary civil law, or military law, or the laws of humanity, ought to be tried, to ascertain whether or not they are guilty, and if found guilty they ought to be punished in the proper way.

Some have suggested—and that, indeed, has been the burden of a good many of these eloquent songs which we have heard—that all criticism or condemnation of this act or that act, contrary though it be to the rules and articles of war, contrary to the genius and practice and laws of our own country, violative of the foundation principles of humanity itself, that all this is to be answered and disposed of in one general phrase about abusing the Army, slandering the Army, assailing the Army.

If one were to think a moment before indulging in these tirades, these wholesale charges that whoever criticises and finds fault, even with what no one can justify and few ought to excuse, is assailing and abusing the Army, if he were at all fair-minded he would abandon that course of argument or declamation. If criticising and condemning that which merits criticism and condemnation is abusing the Army, then charging with abuse those who criticise and condemn that which deserves criticism and condemnation must be justifying the acts which are condemned.

I am not disposed to be so unfair as to charge that any of the gentlemen who indulge in this wild declamation mean actually, coolly, and in their senses to justify, and not many of them, I think, to excuse, acts of wanton cruelty and barbarity. I do not charge that gentlemen who speak upon this subject, and who assail us upon the false charge that we have assailed the Army, mean themselves to justify what we cohdemn. But if criticising the man, whether he be soldier or civilian, whether he be high in office or a private in the ranks of citizenship or of soldiery, for acts which in our judgment and in the common judgment of humanity merit criticism and condemnation—if that be to assail the Government or to slander the Army, then, by the same process of reasoning, the gentlemen who charge us with wholesale slander and assailing of the Army and the Government would be held to justify every act which we condemn, no matter how outrageous.

Now, as I said before, I do not charge them with that. And tested in this way it seems to me that those who desire to be fair and to consider these questions, and momentous they are, with some regard to their merits, will be disposed, upon second thought, to cease from this general and groundless assault.

It is true that upon this side we do not believe in the necessity or utility of a large standing army. It is true that in cherishing this belief we are not advancing or endeavoring to project anything newly discovered or newly exploited. We are simply standing by and trying to defend, as best we may, the traditional policy of our country. We are merely echoing, feebly, if you please, the sentiments expressed over and over, powerfully, and for a century of time convincingly, in this country by the ablest and the greatest men that our statesmanship and our warfare, our philanthropy and our Christianity have ever known.

We hold that a large standing army is an unnecessary thing here, that it is out of harmony with the genius and the purposes of our Government, and that in possibility, aye, in probability, its maintenance is a dangerous departure from well-established and long-maintained principles. In declaring our opposition to a large standing army, in declaring our belief that reliance in this country should be, in the present and in the future, as it has been without failure in the past, upon the yeomanry of the country, upon the citizenship of the land, upon the volunteers called into service when there is need for their services, and returning to the walks of private life when the needs of righteous warfare have passed, we but restate the traditional policy of our country.

Of course, the theory that we do not need a large standing army, and ought not to have it. rests upon the other theory that our pursuits, really and normally and rightfully, are the pursuits of peace; that we are not, ought not to be, and have not been heretofore a nation seeking to interfere with the rights of other nations; that we are not bent upon spoliation and conquest; that our mission is to work out our destiny here—and a lofty and grand one it is—in peace with all the world, provided that, in the proper defense of our own rights, we may remain at peace with the world; but if, unhappily, at any time we are assailed in our rights, that then, when our country is in peril, when our institutions are in danger, when, it may be, our soil is invaded—then, instead of relying upon a mighty standing army, as the despotisms of the Old World do, the appeal shall be made again in the future, as more than once it has been made in the past, to the citizenship of the Republic; and that again in the future, as in the past, the American citizen may be depended upon to rally around the flag of his country, and defend with the last drop of his blood, with the last pulsation of his heart, whatever is sacred to the genius and the principles of the American Government, whatever is and deserves to be dear to the heart of the American patriot.

It was suggested the other day by my friend from California [Mr. KAHN], in a speech of far more than average ability, well delivered and most interesting, that some years ago we gave up too easily a slice of the Northwestern territory which by right we probably could have held, and which by might perhaps we should have clung to, and that because of this we may make a mistake if we give up the Philippines until time shall demonstrate—how much time no one says—whether it would be wise or unwise to give up those far-distant islands. I agree with the eloquent gentleman that in all probability a mistake was made, away back a half century ago, when we allowed our claim to be moved off of a portion of the Northwest Territory which has since become valuable, and which to-day would be desirable for homes for our citizens seeking adventure and fortune in new lands.

But I note a number of very important features in the one case to mark it as distinct and peculiar from the other. This was contiguous territory; territory upon our own continent; territory comparatively uninhabited. This was territory which, if we had retained it, under our form of constitutional organization would have become States in the American Union, upon an equality with all the other States of our Union.

On the other hand, those islands of the Pacific, with 7,000 miles of ocean rolling between them and our shores, of course are not contiguous, and they are already densely populated. No one here contends that we need them or that we will turn them in the course of time into States to be admitted into the American Union. The people who inhabit them—myriads of them—are alien to us in almost everything that we regard as essential in building up here in our own country a magnificent citizenship, controlling and to control a magnificent domain.

Some gentlemen suggest that those of us who do not believe that it is wise or right to extend our dominion and permanently maintain it over far-away islands in distant seas are opposed to "expansion;" that expansion which American principles and practice sanction and justify. This is a fallacious argument, founded upon a most fallacious statement.

Expansion is one thing; colonial empire a far different thing. We are so situated now, with the Atlantic washing the eastern shores of our country and the Pacific the western, that if we would expand in the way known to our fathers, in a way that might be wholesome to the Republic, because the only way that will not mark a radical departure from the principle and practice of our Government, our expansion must be toward the north and the south; must be upon the continent where we are the mightiest factor, where we have been that for half a century or more, almost since our birth.

If it be necessary to expand, if we are to expand—I have not time to discuss that—but if you grant that it is necessary that we shall expand any, we might go to the tropical lands of the south or the frigid lands of the north. The expansion might be directed to Mexico, Central America, and South America in the south, and to the British dominions, even, if you please, to the frozen sea about the North Pole, but always upon our own continent.

So that the question of expansion, as properly understood in this country, is not involved in this discussion, and gentlemen who speak of the acquisition of the Philippines or of their retention as "expansion" are simply and really deluding themselves with what seems to them a euphonious word, in my opinion misapplied, or they know they are wrong and lack the candor to be right.

The real proposition involved, it seems to me, deserves now, as such principles must deserve in all times, careful consideration. I believe, upon the one hand, that if it is good to have the Philippine Islands, and right, the fact that there has been mismanagement, the exercise of bad judgment, arbitrary rule, wrong and outrage in many instances, will not upset the conclusion that we ought to have them. On the other hand, if we ought not to have them, if it is neither beneficial nor right, if to hold them is a mistake on our part and wrong, then no matter how faultless may have been the conduct of everyone representing the Government in the Philippine Islands or in our own land, hold them we should not.

Now, I prefer for a little time to allude to some of the principles—some of the foundation and base-rock principles—which, it seems to me, are involved necessarily in this discussion and in the pending bills. The main question is, Are we going to retain the Philippine Islands; are we going to govern them as to us seems best; are we going to give the people of those islands not what in our Declaration of Independence we declared belongs to all men, but so much of it as to us from time to time seems to be good for them or advantageous to us; or are we, upon the other hand, going to turn over their country to them, going to leave the land to those who dwell in it, going to devote our mighty energies to the development of our own country upon the lines of constitutional liberty and human rights, instead of aping England in quest of colonial empire?

Along these lines is the cleavage between those upon the one side and those upon the other side of these great questions.

I am aware that it may be somewhat trite, and to some it may seem somewhat pedantic, to try soberly to discuss the simple world-wide question of right and wrong. And yet, if we have any regard for right and wrong, if we are to be controlled by principle and not entirely by interest and expediency, how can we discuss these great questions, how can we make up our own minds upon them, how can we direct our own course concerning them, unless we test it all by the old-time rule of right and wrong?

There are two general schools of governmental philosophy in this world, and have been, lo, these many, many years, these many centuries. We on this continent, this great American Republic, represent preeminently, and for a time we represented almost exclusively, the one school. The other has its representatives in the Old World, far back in the old days. Is it worth while again, at this time, to recur to first principles and to consider somewhat the experience of recent years, in order to determine whether we are right in our view of government or whether we are wrong?

Did our forefathers found this Government in wisdom and justice, or did they found it in wrong? Ought we to preserve the landmarks and follow the guideposts set up for us, or ought we to abandon them in our day and generation, abandon what our fathers regarded as the wiser and better course, the course upon which they set us and upon which we have happily traveled for more than a century?

Now, it is a right or it is not a right of the people who dwell in a country to make and control the government which is to be over them. Our citizenship has that right or it has not. Certainly whatever the right, it rests with the masses of the people, or the masses of the people, like so many cattle, so many sheep of the field, are to be driven and worked, are to be sheltered or to be turned adrift in the storm, just as may suit the few—the rulers with whom this supreme right of government rests.

Our philosophy has been, and with me it is yet, that in the mass of citizenship, in the great body of the people of the nation, reside the powers of the nation, and out of that great body must come, from time to time, and into it must go, from time to time, these powers; that those who rule and govern, if they rule and govern of right, if the government be one which has regard for the welfare of the people, if it be one founded upon the eternal principles of justice—that those who shall govern wherever it be must derive all their just power from those who are governed, and must exercise it in accordance with the fundamental laws laid down for their guidance and control.

Now, if we have the right in citizenship to control and direct our own affairs, to make our own public servants and to unmake them, to give power to them and to take power from them, in what position are we to assert that the Filipinos upon the other side of the world do not possess the same right? Upon what principle of justice are we to deny them its exercise?

But it is said they are incapable of self-government. That argument, my friends, if applied, would ruin every atom of freedom that exists in the world. That doctrine, if applied, would make the weak forever and everywhere the victims of the strong. That doctrine, applied in its final analysis, would enable you or me to say to our less fortunate neighbors, "You are not managing this farm well; you are not conducting the operations of this mine properly; your mercantile business is carried on in a very slipshod way; I will take charge of your affairs, and I will allow you to do just so much about them and have just so much of their fruits as to me may seem best. You are not competent to farm; you are not competent to conduct mining operations; you are incapable of following with success mercantile pursuits." In its last analysis this is a law based upon the power of the strong; it is "might is right, and right without might is wrong."

Then, these ideas of self-government and the ability for self-government are, after all, relative. Are all the people of this Union equally qualified for self-government? Everyone knows that that question can not be answered in the affirmative. Everyone knows that in any community, in every community, there is the better class and the worse class, the good and the bad and the indifferent.

A great many wise men, a great many deep-thinking men, have felt and have feared that by the power and votes of the lower elements, especially of the great cities in our own land, our own boasted and heretofore successfully conducted institutions may finally come to naught. Many men in this country, whose opinions are worthy of respect and consideration, believe that the real test of the soundness of our system is made day by day through the years of the present in the large cities of our land.

I believe it is true in the comparatively sparsely populated regions, where the independence of the individual is well preserved and jealously guarded, where each man is a man in his own right, with nobody owning him and nobody directing him, his mind and his conscience being his guide, there none of us need fear danger for the Republic or for any of the cherished institutions of the Republic. But where hordes are gathered in the great cities, where vice and ignorance and poverty compounded make large numbers of men desperate, ready to destroy much worthy of preservation on account of this wrong or that wrong, fancied or real, there lies the danger to our institutions.

And so you might go on to any length and with any number of comparisons. Then, even with us, the capability for self-government is relative. Take out of our own Government, if you please, neutralize and set aside for a time 10 per cent or 20 per cent of the best and most capable of our self-governing citizens and allow the others to control; if you knew that could be done, if you knew that was to be done, as a lover of your country, would you not tremble for the result?

On the other hand, take 10 per cent or 20 per cent from the other end of the line—from the classes least qualified to govern—least appreciative of the benefits of self-government—least worthy to exercise the powers, the great sovereign powers of freemen—and how mightily would the average of citizenship be elevated in this country, how much more secure would our institutions be—how much more rapid would be our progress, and along what better and surer lines would we proceed.

Now, as between individuals, so comparisons may be instituted between nations. I believe it deserves to be axiomatic—and I think the time is coming, if not yet arrived, when it will be—that they who are willing to fight for liberty deserve to enjoy it [loud applause], and they who aspire to govern themselves deserve in their own land, and over their own persons, and over their families—wife and children and all they hold near and dear—to be intrusted with the experiment of self-government.

We are proceeding upon a theory—upon a theory purely—a theory which has never stood the test; a theory which, put in practice, has never resulted otherwise than in failure, that you can govern one kind of people precisely as you can govern another kind of people. What kind of an example are we ourselves furnishing? More than half a century ago the Territory of New Mexico came to us, a part of our conquest in the war with Mexico, ratified by the cession and the treaty of peace.

And yet, with New Mexico for a quarter of a century and more appealing Congress after Congress for admission into the sisterhood of States upon an equality with the other States, admission is denied; a Territorial form of government is yet maintained. Why? Because it is said that a large portion of the inhabitants of New Mexico are of different race, different views of government, different ideas of the conduct of things from the people who constitute our American States; and therefore New Mexico ought to be denied admission to the Union as a State—ought to continue under Territorial government indefinitely.

I am not going into a discussion of that question, for it is a side one, and I adverted to it merely by way of illustration. But here is a confession a half century old, that the policies which may apply and which will prevail successfully in one section of our own country, over one section and class of our own people, are not adapted to another section and another class.

Now, then, we are proceeding in the Philippine Islands upon the theory that what is well adapted to us, what in our experience—in our inherited experience of hundreds of years—has proven good here, is first class, must be first class, for the Filipino right now, right at once. If he does not take kindly to the prescription, then we have in reserve, unfortunately, it seems to me, for him and for us, another prescription, which we are applying with a zeal and a vigor worthy of a far better cause.

If he will not take our civilization, if contrary to all the teachings of history, if contrary to all the facts of his nature and ours, and over all the lines that mark the distinctions between nations and between individuals, he will not at once gladly come up to our measure and accept our ideas and act upon them in our way, we will shoot into him so much of our civilization and government as we shall believe his constitution will stand, and if he survive the shooting—to such of them as do survive it—we will give from time to time just such measures and only such meaure of government as we think they ought to have.

Stating the proposition, my friends, is refuting it. That proposition can not be stated without the very words necessarily used to state it carrying a refutation and a contradiction of its soundness. Whenever government is predicted upon any theory, much worse when it is carried out and the practice of that theory put into play of the weaker getting what the stronger is willing to give, what the stronger thinks is good for him, you have, in essence, tyranny and wrong.

The outrage may be grave, may be such as to startle the intelligence and awaken the indignation of a righteous world; or the wrong may be moderated, or the victim may be voiceless and the world not know the story which if he could reach its ears he could unfold; but the wrong in principle is the same. What right have we to determine whether the Filipinos can govern themselves, or whether they can not; whether they can or can not maintain a government up to the level of ours? What right have we to determine whether they must maintain a government up to the level of ours or have none, except such as we give them? "Oh," says somebody, "this land belongs to us; we acquired it in warfare."

A gentleman suggested the other day in a speech here that while we went into war with Spain for the purpose of freeing Cuba from tyranny, of course anybody having any comprehension of things and any common sense must have realized from the outset that the war would have consequences—that things would happen from it and as results of it. I presume that is true as a general statement. But I would like to know who it was that had the common sense or even the genius, who had the far-sightedness to see, or the patriotism, if you choose to call it that, or precisely the reverse of patriotism, to comprehend the particular "result" with which we are dealing now.

Who was it that saw that one of the results of the war would be that starting in to free Cuba we would end with suppressing the Filipino? The Filipino was struggling for liberty as well as the Cuban. The Filipinos had made sacrifices and had endured wrongs—everything which tyranny can inflict upon a long suffering people—up to the fullest measure ever meted out to Cuba. Their taskmaster was the same. Cuba and the Philippine Islands are in different hemispheres, but the tyranny spread over both alike.

The truth is that our relation to the Filipino is such as to make the obligation upon us even greater to treat him with generosity and magnanimity than it was or is to so treat the Cubans. We entered into the war deliberately to free the Cubans. The Filipino was not in sight, so far as we were concerned. The exigency of that war carried the American fleet under Admiral Dewey into the harbor of Manila and led to the destruction of the Spanish fleet which was found there. We were upon the other side of the world, without land forces to dislodge the Spaniards, complete the conquest of those islands, or even to take the city of Manila.

Under these circumstances (and I am not going into any detail about it), at the suggestion of our own officers, of those who spoke for our Government at home and in the far-away islands of the sea, Aguinaldo returned from his exile in Hongkong to the Philippine Islands, speedily gathered together a force of Filipinos, for whom we furnished the arms and munitions of war, and cooperated with us for months, fighting and defeating the Spaniards, capturing one after another of their forts and armies, shattering the Spanish power upon land almost as completely as Dewey shattered it upon the water, until Filipino land, outside Manila, was wrested from Spain by Aguinaldo's army.

But somebody says there was no agreement that the Filipinos should be regarded as allies; that there was no promise made to Aguinaldo that his people should have freedom. I will not stop to discuss that, though it certainly can not be very creditable, it seems to me, to those who would speak for the great American Republic to make that claim and hinge an argument of any consequence upon that pretense.

Suppose this unsuspecting barbarian, if you call him that; suppose this bad man of the Far East, as you are in the habit of picturing him, was too unsophisticated and had too much confidence in us, had learned too well what the principles of our Government are and what its policies and practices have been, to claim, word for word, a contract and agreement with the representatives of this Government?

Suppose he said to himself, or suppose the other intelligent Filipinos said one to another, "These people are fighting for liberty over in their own hemisphere. They went into this war to strike the shackles from the limbs of the Cubans. The same kind of shackles were on our limbs; the same master artificer in cruelty welded all of them. Oh, it can not be that these deliverers of the Cubans will prove our oppressors. It would be an insult to their intelligence, it would be an insult to their patriotism, it would be a confession of ignorance of their whole history, of the genius of their Government, to question or doubt that they will do for us, or rather, let us do for ourselves, what they are doing for the Cubans."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Filipinos did cooperate with us. They did, in their way, and enthusiastically, because they were fighting for liberty, fighting in their own land for their own freedom, fighting for "their altars and their fires," fighting for "the green graves of their sires," fighting for everything that free men hold dear, everything that men cherishing sentiments of freedom and under oppression fight for and starve for and die for. I care not whether there was or was not a formal agreement. We owe them more than we owe the Cubans. Why rob them of the liberty they won while fighting their battles and ours?

Can they maintain a government? Let them try. Let us see; and if they fail—if we allow the flag of the republic of the Philippines to go up; if we allow the Filipino flag which we pulled out of the air which they and we cleared of the foul odor of Spanish oppression once again to float there; if we allow a republic, the successor of that which we shot to pieces after it had for months maintained order and administered the law throughout those islands, again to be established, and if in the providence of God flag and republic fall, which I do not believe they will, one thing will not fail, one thing will not be lost while time endures, while men love freedom and abhor tyranny—the glorious page that we will write in our own history by establishing a Filipino republic instead of an American despotism. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Freeing a people instead of holding selfish dominion over them, devoting our energies to securing their independence after having done that great and good act in our own hemisphere, instead of throwing away the lives of many of our people and dissipating our energies in subjugating those who would be free—that would be something worthy of our past and encouraging for our future.

The majority would subject the Filipinos to alien rule for an indefinite time, if not forever. We upon this side of the Chamber would help them to set up a government of their own, and then we would leave them free to govern themselves, reserving and retaining for ourselves only such naval and coaling stations as they would gladly give us and as we should deem best suited to our uses as a liberty-loving, justice-doing, peace-promoting people.

The one policy is English, the other is truly American. The one has marked Ireland with desolation, has sent her bravest and best sons into exile, has implanted eternal hatred in the Irish soul for the English oppressor. It has destroyed the two Boer Republics. It has perpetrated cruelties and outrages by wholesale in every quarter of the globe. It has accumulated for old England wrath against the day of wrath. It has prepared the way for the fall of the empire built upon wrong, and thus far sustained by cruelty and greed. The other policy—the American policy—has built upon the corner stone of justice and human freedom the grandest Republic this earth ever knew.

Now, which policy shall be ours in dealing with the Filipinos? Over here we are a unit for the American policy and a unit against the English policy.

The majority bill provides for taking from the Filipinos the lands of the islands and giving them to corporations, native and foreign, English as well as American. This looks like brutal greed. Indeed, it looks to me very much as if the chief end and object of the legislation which the majority advocate is to despoil the Filipinos of their birthright, and give, as speedily as possible, the fruits of the spoliation to favorite henchmen, organized into corporations with English adventurers, ready to employ the American Government as a tool for the accomplishment of their piratical designs.

If this is not so, why is it that a Filipino can get but 40 acres for a home in his own country, while a corporation—black or white or mongrel, native or foreign, American or English, or, as some among us would have everything, Anglo-American—can have about 5,000 acres of the Filipino's land?

But we need not be surprised at this. Those who are ready to rob a people of their liberties, upon the poor pretext that they can not govern themselves, never scruple long about robbing them of their property also. In most cases, and probably in this one, the moving impulse from the first is greed.

Mr. Chairman, a short time ago it was my privilege to visit Habana, the beautiful capital of the new Cuban Republic, to witness the ceremonies when that Republic assumed formally its place in the sisterhood of nations. I saw the Stars and Stripes, the flag which we floated over all the public buildings in Habana, the flag that we all love, all honor, the flag that ought not to be trailed in the mire of wrongdoing, ought not to be sullied by base deeds, justified or excused—I saw that flag floating over all the public buildings in Habana, and at noon upon the 20th of last May I saw it come down from every flagstaff as peacefully as it is lowered at sunset from the flagstaffs in our own land; and as it came down the flag of the Republic of Cuba arose gracefully to its place as the emblem of a new Republic.

I do not know how others would be affected by the sight. I do not know what effect the shouting populace, the playing bands, the waving flags, the salvos of artillery at the birth of the new Republic might have upon others, but for me as an American citizen, cherishing, I hope, the principles of this Government, aspiring for it, if I may, to everything that is great and good, and disposed to protect it from every stain of dishonor, if I could—for me that was an inspiring sight, far more inspiring, as I view it, than if the American flag, as some wish, had remained "put" in Cuba, the faith of the American people violated, the young Republic strangled, and eternal wrong done.

What we did with Cuba we may do in the Philippines. That proud May day of 1902 can find its duplicate eventually—it should find it soon—in those far-away islands of the tropic seas. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the magnitude and importance of the task upon which we are engaged is readily understood when it is considered that we are providing a scheme of government for nearly three times as many people as inhabited the United States when the Federal Constitution was framed and adopted. This is to be the organic law for some 10,000,000 of human beings, divided into many classes and tribes, speaking many different languages and dialects, and occupying an archipelago having an area of 127,853 square miles, comprising many islands, provinces, and municipalities. Three different measures are before us. First, the Senate bill, which is nominally under consideration; second, the Cooper bill, indorsed by the Republican majority of the Insular Committee, and, third, the Democratic substitute, recommended by the minority of the committee.

Between the Senate bill and the Cooper or House bill there are many differences in matter of detail and in three important general provisions. The House bill provides, as the Senate does not, for a Philippine congress, in which the Philippine Commission is to be the senate and the lower house composed of Filipinos elected by those entitled to vote under the suffrage qualifications of our bill. This much of participation in the government or in the making of its laws is earnestly desired by the leading Filipinos, and is urged by Governor Taft and the Philippine Commission as desirable and necessary in order to give them experience in governmental affairs and greater satisfaction and contentment with the existence in those islands of the authority of the United States.

Again, while the Senate bill in its coinage provisions leaves those islands substantially upon a silver basis, the House bill puts their currency upon a gold basis. This we consider desirable because of the great fluctuations in the value of silver, the exorbitant rates of exchange charged by bankers, and the fact that in value and volume the commerce of the Philippine Islands with gold-standard countries is five times as great as with silver-standard countries. The silver money in use in those islands is now coined mostly in Mexico. We believe that the system of coinage proposed in our bill will improve and increase trade relations between the Philippines and the United States, and that for many other reasons our coinage and currency provisions are better.

The provisions of the House and Senate bills with reference to the establishment of mining rights in the islands are very different and will require careful consideration.

I did not become a member of the Insular Committee until after the preparation of the bill had been substantially completed, having been appointed but recently to fill the vacancy occasioned by the regretted retirement from this body of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Moody] to accept and adorn the position of Secretary of the Navy. It is therefore not boastful nor in any wise violative of that modesty which is becoming to state that in my judgment there has not for a long time been presented for the consideration of this House any bill upon the preparation of which there has been brought to bear more of time, of thought, of brains, of patriotic endeavor, and of wise statesmanship, than upon House bill 13445.

No bill has been presented for a long time in which the thought and intention of the framer has been expressed in language more clear, concise, and apt.

No report more comprehensive and exhaustive or more happily expressed has been submitted to accompany any bill than that submitted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], chairman of the Insular Committee, and no one could have made a more eloquent and masterful presentation of the subject than was contained in his address in opening this debate.

Upon the whole we consider that the House bill is more nearly in accord with the needs of the Filipinos, that it will give them a greater interest in the Government and a greater measure of that liberty and happiness which it is our desire to confer upon them, at the same time preserving the dignity, authority, and rights of the United States in those islands.

The details of both House and Senate bills have been and will be very carefully explained by members of the Insular Committee who have given the subject longer and more intelligent consideration than I. Let me devote a few minutes to the consideration of the substitute bill recommended by the Democratic members of the committee and to the remarkable report accompanying the same.

This is what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] calls the "prescription" compounded by the minority and warranted to cure all the ills to which the Filipino is heir. I noticed that in his remarks while indorsing it he carefully refrained from discussing its details. It is really interesting, if not important, to consider them. First, let us look at the report, signed by the six Democratic members of the Insular Committee, embodying the wisdom and policy of that party and accompanying and embracing their substitute bill. In that report they say:

> The chief question involved is whether, under the guise of the forms of civil government, a policy unjust and cruel to the people of the Philippine Islands and injurious and dishonoring to American citizenship shall be indefinitely if not perpetually continued.

Their bill is founded upon the proposition that our present policy toward the Filipinos is "unjust and cruel," a proposition which I challenge and deny. Their bill is founded upon that false statement. It is a bill which no intelligent body of statesmen would ever dream of enacting into law. It was not framed by our Democratic brethren with the intention of helping in the solution of these vexed problems. It was prepared upon the general Democratic principle of obstruction—of putting obstacles in the Republican pathway, which is ever the pathway of liberty and of progress.

According to the Paris Messenger, an eminent French scientist, Dr. Javal by name, has discovered a sixth sense, which he calls "the sense of obstacles." The seat of this sense he locates in the forehead. It acts "by the perception of certain warm and indefinite vibrations," enabling the person possessing it to be aware of obstacles neither seen, heard, touched, tasted, nor smelled, so that although a man may have lost all other senses he may yet not run his head against a brick wall. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that so far as it is possessed by the Democratic party, this sixth sense is not located in the forehead, but somewhere very close to the long ears. The vibrations may be warm, but they are altogether too indefinite to be useful, and this sixth sense or faculty is perverted into a disease so that the possessor is not only continually running its head against brick walls and other obstacles, but even creates them in its own pathway while striving to put them in the pathway of the Republican party, which, as I have said, is the pathway of human progress.

When, in 1898, President McKinley and conservative members of both Houses of Congress were striving to prevent war, the Democratic party, upon this floor, threw obstacles in the way of peace. As one of its brilliant members, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], said, they drew us into war "by the scruff of the neck." When we were fairly launched in war the Republican party endeavored to carry it through to the speediest and most complete success, but Democracy again broke out with this disease of "obstacles" and endeavored to impede progress by voting against the measures necessary to provide the sinews of war, because, forsooth, we would not accept the still greater obstacle, the free coinage of silver, as the condition of Democratic support. Upon the 29th of April, 1898, when we were in the midst of war, 131 Democrats in this House voted against the bill authorizing the Government to issue bonds and provide the revenue necessary to carry on the war.

The war having been brought to a successful conclusion, the Democrats in Congress generally threw every possible obstacle in the way of the ratification of the treaty of peace, until finally their leader, Mr. Bryan, with greater patriotism than they, came to Washington and secured enough Democratic votes to accomplish its ratification by the Senate.

As the result of that treaty the Government and the present and future welfare of the Philippines was intrusted to the United States. We did not seek the Philippines. They have been, as it were, thrown into our lap by the fortunes of war. Had the Spanish fleet been elsewhere than at Manila it might have been sunk by Admiral Dewey without involving us in the control of those islands. But he found it there and destroyed it there, and there was nothing else for him to do but capture Manila and remain there. That having been accomplished the necessity of protecting and governing the people of those islands devolved upon the United States. To have reestablished the Spanish Government there would have been a crime. Hence in the treaty there was no other course than that the Philippines should be ceded to the United States. Democratic as well as Republican members of the Paris Commission agreed to that.

That territory having been ceded to the United States, we found an insurrection in progress in certain parts of the islands. The Democratic party continually placed obstacles in the way of quelling that insurrection. Now that the insurrection has been practically quelled, it seeks in this House to create distrust of the Republican Administration which has brought about that happy result and to place obstacles in the way of the adoption of a measure for the peaceful and satisfactory government of those peoples. The obstacle upon which it most relies is the charge of cruelty contained in this minority report. Day after day we hear echoing through these Halls charges against the Army, against the privates and against the officers, against the Secretary of War, against the President as Commander in Chief of the Army, and against the entire Administration, all in the hope of destroying the efficiency of the Army and the efficiency of the Administration to bring about a happy solution of these difficulties.

A few acts of cruelty, actual or alleged, on the part of soldiers have been magnified, distorted, and made the subject of wholesale abuse of the entire Army. A few weeks ago the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] read with great glee, upon this floor, the tale told by one Corporal O'Brien of alleged outrages perpetrated upon Filipinos. The tale itself bore every evidence of fabrication. A few days later Mr. Corporal O'Brien was summoned by the Senate investigating committee, and by his own testimony and that of far more reliable witnesses was proved a perjurer, he not having been within 30 miles of the place where he said he saw the outrages committed. I have been patiently waiting, day after day, for the gentleman from Missouri to rise in his place and apologize to the Army, but he has not done so.

Day after day and night after night this Chamber resounds with the denunciations of Gen. H. R. J. Smith—"Hell Roaring Jake Smith," they are pleased to call him—because they say he issued a verbal order that the province of Samar should be made a howling wilderness and directing that all bearing arms should be slain. General Smith has been tried by court-martial for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he did give any order in violation of the rules of war. The result of that court-martial has not yet been made public, but it is generally believed that he has been acquitted. Gentlemen upon the other side, however, condemn and immediately find him guilty, without waiting to hear his defense or caring whether or not he has any. It is only fair to consider his side of the case.

From the Manila American of May 4, 1902, I quote the following extracts from the address of Col. Charles A. Woodruff, who defended General Smith before the court-martial. Among other things he said:

> In olden times a Roman general returning from a victorious campaign sometimes tied his captives to his chariot. In this case a conquering general returning from a successful campaign finds himself tied to the chariot.

> For the last few months it has seemed to be popular to criticise the army in the Philippines. I regret to say that our people at home appear to have forgotten the magnificent services which they have made for America's honor and glory. Through good and evil report, through sun and rain, through mud and dust, across rivers, over mountains, through tangled underbrush, in sickness and in health, they have reflected nothing but honor and glory on the flag of their country. They have been worthy members of that Army whose bayonets have never flashed in any clime save in defense of the law, whose steady tramp has ever carried comfort to those in danger, and whose flag has waved an unbroken promise of protection to peaceful citizens of every race, sex, and condition. And yet we are to-day apparently degraded and disgraced. Why is this?
> I think, Mr. President and gentlemen of the court, that we are too far away from home to know. I can not for a moment imagine that any class of people in our native land expect to gain glory or political advancement among American people by abusing the Army. It was tried after the Mexican war, and "Rough and Ready" Zach Taylor was elected President. It was tried in '64, and McClellan—"Little Mac"—loved and honored though he had been, is remembered to-day as a good man gone wrong. It was tried after the civil war. The result was that Ulysses S. Grant, "the butcher," was elected President and died loved and honored by every American citizen. They can rest assured that no man can achieve greatness or will have greatness thrust upon him by abusing the American Army in the Philippine Islands.

Speaking more directly of General Smith, Colonel Woodruff says:

> He was wounded in the assault upon San Juan Hill and now carries a Mauser bullet in his body. He has served in these islands for three years and his activity, pluck, and energy are known to all men living in the Philippine Islands.
> For forty-one years he has worn the uniform of the United States Army with honor to himself and benefit to the flag under which he has fought and bled. And now he has, at the close of a most remarkable and successful campaign, during which he has accomplished that which Spain, in her three hundred years' occupancy never achieved, the pacification of Samar. While returning to his family and his native land, after three years' service here, covered as he and all those who knew him thought with honor and glory, he is halted, taken off the transport to face charges for the language he used in giving instructions for the conduct of a most successful campaign. We feel that the Government has only done this in deference to an overwhelming or noisy public sentiment in the United States, based upon rumors fostered for some unknown, and, I believe, ignoble purposes, until hysteria has been produced, and this gray-haired, wounded, victorious general is exposed to the indignity of a court-martial in deference to that hysterical public opinion.

We have not deemed it compatible with the dignity of a general officer of the United States Army to take the witness stand to explain to his peers his words when instructing his subordinate officers how to crush the outlaws, or to make clear to them actions committed in compliance with the law and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

If anyone can read the modest story of Sergeant Mumby without a welling up in his heart of pride in the enlisted man of the United States Army, he is unworthy of the name of American. We can see that heroic band, fighting with naked hand, baseball bats, bread and butcher knives, stabbed in back and breast, knocked down, piled up, still fighting on; then their thoughtfulness in trying to destroy everything of value to these murderers; then their kind care of their sorely wounded comrades; then their return to the rescue and what they saw. Their loved captain, who had knelt at the same altar with his murderers, cut, slashed, and burned; their young lieutenant, a fire kindled around him, his legs nearly cut off, his head split open, and in mere barbarous wantonness the gaping wound filled with blackberry jam, comrades with their bodies mangled and defiled.

If there is an American who can look upon the spectacle of forty-six murdered Americans, stripped of their uniforms which they had worn with honor to their country and to the benefit of the Philippine Islands, with their hacked and gashed bodies, defiled as savages and barbarians can defile them, I say if there is an American who can look upon American soldiers, butchered and defiled as they were, and not feel that action, prompt, drastic, and effective was imperative, then he is destitute of those elements of manhood that go to make up the true American. You have had described to you the pitfalls and spring guns which the natives so plentifully strew along the pathway our soldiers have to travel. You have been told how their commanding officer, their commanding general, directed them to set plenty of poison traps and gave them the receipt for the poison, also the antidotes in case any of them should be hurt themselves.

You gentlemen know the awful strain of waiting for an expected onslaught and the result in victory or death and mutilation. If the trail will permit of two abreast, they go, one with bayonet to the right, the other with bayonet to the left. If in single file, No. 1 with bayonet to the right, No. 2 with bayonet to the left. No advance guard or flankers can be sent out. It would be a vain precaution, expecting at every moment to receive the rush, and the only thing that worried these men was that they might be jumped when it was impossible for them to rally back to back. They did not cringe from a frontal attack, but every time met death with death where death was rife.

The written orders and circulars issued by General Smith—and by these, rather than a few isolated expressions, should his meanings be judged—these indicate the kind of warfare he intended to prosecute, and no exceptions can be taken to them. They were conceived in loyalty to the United States, executed with vigor, and as soon as results were obtained were gradually softened. Yet all through them is exhibited a most humane, kindly sentiment toward those who manifested loyalty to the authority of the United States.

General Grant ordered that the Shenandoah Valley should be made a "desolate waste." Sherman left Georgia scarcely more than that after his famous march to the sea. Stonewall Jackson, the Christian soldier of the Confederacy, advocated raising the black flag against Union soldiers. The Confederate army would have left little more than a howling wilderness in its wake through Pennsylvania had it not been intercepted at Gettysburg.

Bouvier's Law Dictionary, volume 2, page 802, defining "quarter," as that term is used in the laws of war, quotes Risley on the Law of War, and says:

By the end of the seventeenth century quarter became a recognized usage of war. It is forfeited under exceptional circumstances only:

1. In case of absolute and overwhelming necessity, as where a small force is encumbered with a large number of prisoners in a savage or hostile country and may be justified in killing them for their own self-preservation.

2. Where belligerents violate the laws of war they may be refused quarter.

3. By way of retaliation against an enemy who has denied quarter without a cause.

I hold in my hand what is known as General Orders, No. 100, entitled "Instructions for the government of armies of the United States in the field," issued from the War Department April 24, 1863, during the civil war. It still remains in force, and contains, among others, the following provisions:

PAR. 23. Private citizens are no longer murdered, enslaved, or carried off to distant parts, and the inoffensive individual is as little disturbed in his private relations as the commander of the hostile troops can afford to grant in the overruling demands of a vigorous war.

* * * * * * *

PAR. 60. It is against the usage of modern war to resolve, in hatred and revenge, to give no quarter. No body of troops has the right to declare that it will not give and therefore will not expect quarter; but a commander is permitted to direct his troops to give no quarter, in great straits, when his own salvation makes it impossible to cumber himself with prisoners.

* * * * * * *

PAR. 70. The use of poison in any manner, be it to poison wells or food or arms, is wholly excluded from modern warfare. He that uses it puts himself out of the pale of the law and usages of war.

PAR. 71. Whoever intentionally inflicts additional wounds on an enemy already wholly disabled or kills such an enemy, or who orders or encourages soldiers to do so, shall suffer death, if duly convicted, whether he belongs to the Army of the United States or is an enemy captured after having committed his misdeed.

* * * * * * *

PAR. 82. Men or squads of men who commit hostilities, whether by fighting or inroads for destruction or plunder, or by raids of any kind, without commission, without being part and portion of the organized hostile army, and without sharing continuously in the war, but who do so with intermitting returns to their homes and avocations, or with the occasional assumption of the semblance of peaceful pursuits, divesting themselves of the character or appearance of soldiers—such men or squads of men are not public enemies, and therefore, if captured, are not entitled to the privileges of prisoners of war, but shall be treated summarily as highway robbers or pirates.

General Sherman wrote to General Burbridge in June, 1864:

You may order all your post and district commanders that guerrillas are not soldiers, but wild beasts, unknown to the usage of war. To be recognized as soldiers they must be enlisted, enrolled, officered, uniformed, armed, and equipped by some recognized belligerent power.

General Smith's counsel claims that upon these authorities his order was fully justified under the laws of war and rules governing the Army. Whether it was or not we shall soon know, when the President has acted upon the report of the court-martial. If he is found innocent, these charges of course fall to the ground. On the other hand, if he is found guilty and punished, that fact will equally refute the charge that the "policy" of the United States is cruel and unjust. In neither event can this charge found in the report of the minority of the Insular Comittee be sustained.

The Manila American of May 4, 1902, says editorially:

The administration of the army in the Philippines has been admirable, and there can not be too much said in praise of the services of officers and men. Confronted with an elusive and treacherous enemy, driven to impassable ravines and untrampled brush, through miry fields and desolate jungle, the American Army has well sustained the glory of the flag and perpetuated the sacred principles of liberty and justice.

During this discussion it has been alleged time and again upon that side of the Chamber that women and children were killed under General Smith's order. Another member charged, or at least insinuated, that it is the common practice of our soldiers to jab their bayonets into the stomachs of children. All such charges are absolutely baseless. Not the slightest scintilla of evidence has been or can be produced showing slaughter or illtreatment of women and children.

Against that statement I place the testimony of Felipe Buencamino, given before the Committee on Insular Affairs on the 31st day of last month. Formerly a member of Aguinaldo's cabinet, now leader of the Federal party, composed of all the influential Filipinos, he represents also all the commanders of the Katipunan society. He knows whereof he speaks. Asked by the chairman how the present condition of the people of the Philippines in the cities and in the country compares with their condition under the Spanish Government, he replied:

In one word, they may be compared as happiness and misery.

He was then asked:

Under the civil and provincial governments established by the Taft Commission do not the people of the Philippine Islands enjoy greater liberty than they would have enjoyed under the Aguinaldo government if it had been established?

His answer was:

They have much more liberty.

He gave in detail the reasons why their condition under the United States was that of happiness, compared with the misery they suffered under Spanish rule, and why he considered that they enjoyed greater liberty now than Aguinaldo's government could have given them, even had he succeeded in establishing it.

Buencamino was cross-examined for two days by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], who failed to weaken in the slightest degree the force of his statements. Testimony favorable to the Army or creditable to the good name of our country is not relished upon that side of the Chamber, and when our friends over there do not like testimony they abuse the witness. The gentleman from Virginia attacks upon this floor the veracity of Buencamino. On Saturday the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], finding that the figures contained in the report of the Secretary of War did not show as great expenditures in the Philippines as he had hoped, saw fit to doubt the integrity of the report and insinuated that expenses in the Philippines had been withheld or improperly charged to other accounts. Secretary Root is as straightforward and honest as he is brave and fearless, and all insinuations of that character fall harmless. As for Buencamino, his statement is fully corroborated by the testimony of Professor Schurman, president of the first Philippine Commission, who says:

American sovereignty over the Philippines having been established by treaty was a fact which was no longer open to discussion by Filipinos in arms. And in meetings of the Commission with them I always ruled that question out of order and refused to permit any speaker to debate it.

The Tagalog insurgents and their Philippine republic did not represent the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, but only a minority of them.

For these reasons and also because Aguinaldo's men were rebels in arms, we insisted that the recognition of American sovereignty was the first condition of peace.

The leaders perceived that under American sovereignty they would enjoy greater liberties than they had ever dreamed of under Spanish rule, and if not a nominal independence at least a firmer and surer self-government than their own Philippine republic could ever guarantee.

Yet, in the face of such testimony, the Democratic members of this committee solemnly declare that the United States is pursuing "a policy unjust and cruel to the people of the Philippine Islands."

When a man is knocked down, his eyes gouged out and his thumb chewed, you can not expect him to fight in entire accordance with the Marquis of Queensbury rules, and it is hardly fair to him to cry "foul" even if under such conditions he strike his adversary below the belt. Because one Filipino, or a dozen, may have been by individual soldiers pumped full of water to compel information, tending to show who had been guilty of dismembering a United States soldier and throwing his arms and legs into a swamp, it will not do to charge either the Administration or the Army with "a policy unjust and cruel."

The wholesale charges made upon the floor of this Chamber against the Army are already bringing forth fruit. This morning's papers tells us that last Saturday evening, in Knoxville, Tenn., doubtless taking his cue from one of the speeches made here, a man made the broad charge that two-thirds of the Army was composed of hoodlums and the other third of bullies and cowards. That statement resulted in a very violent disturbance and the probable loss of four lives.

The Army of the United States is not made up of Hessian hirelings. It is composed of the flower of American manhood. In no other country is the army so close to the people. Our soldiers in the Philippines have relatives or friends in every city, town, and hamlet in the United States. The great mass of the American people is in sympathy with them and condemn the unjust attacks which are daily made upon these brave men 10,000 miles away, with no opportunity of being heard in their own defense. If gentlemen of the minority believe they are making political capital by such attacks, I want to tell them that their sense of obstacles is misplaced.

They are running their heads against a brick wall. The great mass of Democratic voters do not sympathize with these attacks. They do not intend to be less patriotic than the great mass of Republicans. Democratic soldiers distinguished themselves equally with Republicans in the war with Spain. Thousands of Democrats have served their country bravely and well in the Philippines. Neither they nor their friends admire or approve the untrue and baseless charges of cruelty made and reiterated upon this floor even after proof of their falsity has been produced. Individual instances of cruelty have doubtless occurred—acts which all condemn. There never was a war in which there were not some. But you will never convince the people of the United States that the American soldier boy is unjust or unnecessarily cruel, and they will not thank you for trying to. Our policy toward the people of the Philippines was inaugurated by our late martyred President William McKinley, the mildest and gentlest of all earth's rulers. You will never convince the American people that "a policy cruel and unjust" was designed by one who, fainting with agony, could yet find voice and heart to say of the assassin who struck him down, "Do not hurt him."

I refute and deny the charge of cruelty and injustice, and am ashamed that it is made in a document promulgated officially in this House.

Proceeding in their report, our Democratic friends say that their substitute is submitted because our bill is "vicious in principle, bad in its details, unjust, inexpedient." They further say, and I particularly call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] to this language which accompanies the "prescription" prepared for us. The report says:

Recognizing that three centuries of Spanish dominion have destroyed all self-government in the Philippine Islands, and that its people at this time are unprepared for its exercise, the theory upon which this substitute measure is framed is that there should be conferred upon them for a period of eight years the largest possible share in the government of themselves and in the conduct of their affairs, etc.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It says that three hundred years of tyranny have destroyed self-government; it does not say the capacity for self-government. It says that those people are now unprepared for the exercise of self-government because they have no self-governing institutions left. It does not say that the capacity for self-government was destroyed, but that self-government itself was destroyed. Does not the gentleman admit that? Are there any self-governing Filipinos there?

Mr. OLMSTED. I believe I correctly read the report:

Recognizing that three centuries of Spanish dominion have destroyed all self-government in the Philippine Islands, and that its people at this time are unprepared for its exercise.

That is the language of the report. If they are "unprepared," it must be because they are incapable. If they are capable, how can it be said they are unprepared? Yet they say substantially in their bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That eight years from to-day they shall be capable, and after that time they shall be set adrift to look out for themselves.

In other words, they propose to make them capable by an act of Congress, although for three hundred years they have not been.

Now, I want to call attention to some of the provisions of this bill emanating from the minority of the committee which says that our bill is vicious in principle and bad in detail.

That the government of the Philippines established in accordance with the provisions of this act shall assume and carry into effect the treaty obligations of the United States with the Kingdom of Spain.

Think of that—devolving upon those people, who for three hundred years have been and still are incapable of exercising self-government, the solemn obligations of the United States under its treaty with Spain. There is consistency. There is wisdom. There is statesmanship. There is a due regard for the dignity and reputation of this nation. Our bill is—

Vicious in principle, bad in its details, unjust, inexpedient.

But here is the embodied justice, virtue, and expediency of the minority. The United States shall evade its solemn responsibilities and treaty obligations by shifting them onto Philippine shoulders. That may be good in principle and perfect in detail, but it will not so commend itself, I am sure, to the judgment of this House.

Further, the president of the Philippines is to have power, by and with the consent of the senate, etc., to make treaties with other nations, and without consulting the United States or any of its authorities may, by the advice of two-thirds of a native Filipino senate, nominate and appoint ambassadors, ministers, and consuls.

These are the people, for three hundred years without self-government and now incapable of its exercise, never having read a treaty nor seen an ambassador, minister, or consul. They are at once, by this proposed Democratic measure, placed in diplomatic relations with the whole world—relations which may involve us as well as them in international complications which we should desire to avoid.

Now, here is more "perfection of detail:"

"Each legislative district shall choose a senator and a representative at the next election." Each district chooses a senator and a representative; yet there are to be 30 members in one body and 100 in the other. That is "perfection of detail," but not of arithmetic.

Then, four sections later, it is provided that in each district they shall elect two senators. I should like some of those six gentlemen who joined in this report to explain the details of their bill in these inconsistent particulars.

Then these representatives are to serve "from the date of their election," which is the first Monday in May, "for the length of their terms from and after July 4, 1903." Perhaps somebody will explain that "perfect detail."

But when we come down to the qualifications of voters, that is where we get detail in the greatest perfection.

The eighth section of the minority bill defines qualified electors to be:

All male inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, 21 years of age, and able to read or write, or who have paid the government of the Philippines, during the calendar year next preceding the calendar year of the election, at least $2 for poll or other taxes, and who shall have resided in the Philippines for two years next preceding the date of election. The sole penalty of the non-payment of the $2 poll tax (which is hereby assessed and levied, to be paid on January 1 of each calendar year, beginning with a payment on or before January 1, 1901) shall be a deprivation of the right to vote at any election during that and the succeeding calendar year nor shall the payment of said poll tax be enforcible by any legal procedure.

The tax provision, it will be noted, is in brackets—the tax is parenthetically imposed. I never heard of taxation by parenthesis before. Here we are, in June, 1902, levying a tax to be paid on or before January 1, 1901. "Backward, turn backward, O Time, in thy flight," to enable the poor Filipinos to comply with this remarkable provision.

The same section requires that an election shall be held—not later than the first Monday of May, 1903.

To enable the Filipino to vote he must have paid his poll tax—during the calendar year next preceding the calendar year of the election.

That is to say, he can not vote at the first election in May, 1903, unless he shall have paid a poll tax January 1, 1902. As no such tax had been assessed, of course no such tax was paid, and therefore, under the provisions of this very perfect substitute bill, the poor Filipino can not possibly be qualified to vote in May, 1903, when the first election is to be held. This "prescription" offered by the minority and supported by my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] provides that—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

Then, a little later on, follows this provision:

When the president of the Philippines is tried, or the secretary of state for foreign affairs, the chief justice of the supreme court of the Philippines shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members thereof.

Members of what? The senate, or the supreme court, or both? But that is not the worst of it. This bill is only to run for eight years, and yet a little further along it provides that—for eight years nobody shall be convicted without the concurrence of three-fourths of the members present.

Whether of the court or the senate we are not advised. Now, is it not a little peculiar, is it not vicious in principle as well as bad in detail that the governor of the Philippines who is appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate of the United States, and the secretary of foreign affairs, appointed in the same way, may yet be removed by a tribunal of native Filipinos, and the United States have no voice in the matter?

Next we come to an absurd adaptation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. Our Union was formed by the union of several independent States. It was not intended to take away from them the power of regulating their own purely intra-State commerce, but only interstate commerce. The Constitution of the United States therefore provides that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." Each State has its own government and is left to regulate its own purely internal commerce.

Now, see how the framers of this minority prescription have adapted that provision to this proposed Democratic Filipino constitution. Their bill says:

The congress of the Philippines shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations or with savage or barbarous tribes within the Philippines.

Nobody else. Upon the expressio unius exclusio alterius principle of construction, clearly nobody else. How, then, is commerce within or among the civilized provinces to be regulated? Where is that power to be lodged? This minority measure would take it away from the Congress of the United States, while not vesting it in the Philippine congress, whose power is expressly limited to the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and with savages.

In short, this bill which accompanies the report of the minority of the Insular Affairs Committee, signed by the six Democratic members thereof, and which we are asked to believe is much better than the bill submitted by the majority, is simply a hotchpotch of certain provisions of the Federal Constitution, certain provisions of certain State constitutions, and numerous provisions that it is impossible to conceive that any intelligent body of men would think of ingrafting upon any constitution. It is too absurd to receive serious consideration.

These defects and inconsistencies that I have pointed out constitute the least objectionable features of the bill. It is even more "vicious in principle" than it is "bad in its details." It could not possibly commend itself either to the Filipinos or to the American people.

That is why, perhaps, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], who represents the minority in this matter, has just introduced a new bill, which appeared for the first time in print the very day this discussion began. If the other members of the minority of the Insular Committee accept this bill in lieu of their own, then they acknowledge their inability to prepare a constitution, for this new bill provides that the Filipinos themselves shall call a constitutional convention and frame one of their own. The gentlemen of the minority, after their first attempt, have evidently concluded that although for three centuries and more the Filipinos have been and still are unprepared for the exercise of self-government, nevertheless they are better prepared and better qualified than they to frame a proper constitution, and upon that point I think we must all agree after considering the woeful failure of the minority members in that direction.

This latest bill is even more objectionable than the original substitute. Although conceding in their unanimous report that for three hundred years the Filipinos have been incapable of self-government, they reduce the limit from eight years to four and ask the Congress of the United States to solemnly enact that they shall be capable within four years, and that not later than the first Monday of January, 1905, they shall frame a constitution and be deemed capable in law of governing themselves and thereafter cut loose, set adrift, and declare themselves a separate nation—

As fully separate and independent as other separate and independent nations are.

In the meantime the Filipino congress (composed entirely of native Filipinos, who for three hundred years have been incapable of self-government and are not yet prepared for its exercise) is required—

To carry into effect the treaty obligations of the United States with the Kingdom of Spain, and for the maintenance and protection of all rights and property acquired under authority of the United States.

Practically, under the Jones bill, everything is surrendered to the Filipinos immediately the President shall have proclaimed that all armed resistance of the United States has ceased in the archipelago, the United States retaining for four years control and regulation of the Philippines in their intercourse with foreign nations only.

The Filipinos may, however, hold the constitutional convention before 1905, and immediately upon the adoption of a constitution by them this new bill makes it the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the complete independence of the people of the Philippine Archipelago. This means a practical abandonment of the islands to a people who confessedly for three hundred years have been and still are incapable of self-government. It does not even permit the United States to retain such lands and water as may be necessary for naval, military, and coaling stations, terminal facilities for submarine cables, etc., unless the same shall be agreed to by the Philippine government.

Another important difference between our bill and the Democratic measure is in dealing with trusts. In ours we have made the most stringent provisions against large ownership or the undue exercise of power in these islands by trusts or large combinations of capital. Neither one of the Democratic measures contains the slightest provision upon the subject. Pass the Democratic measure and 30,000,000 acres of rarest mahogany forests, the inexhaustible mines and basins of oil, and the agricultural lands of the Philippines—"sweet fields arrayed in living green"—so productive that upon the average 1 acre there is equal to 4 here, will be entirely open to exploitation by trusts, great corporations, or other vast aggregations of capital.

When it comes to trusts, the Democratic party is always long on promises but short in performance. Its opposition to them is confined entirely to platform planks and campaign oratory. Now that our Democratic friends have, right here, by voting for our bill, a chance to do something to restrict the operation of trusts in these rich islands, they fail to embrace the opportunity. Having shown their utter inability to advance an intelligent or even plausible scheme of government for the Philippines, they yet oppose ours. Not one of them has attempted to analyze it or show any reason why it should not pass. But during the long days and nights of this debate they continually shout about alleged cruelties practiced by the American soldiers upon the Filipinos.

Why do they oppose the passage of this bill? Being asked if he thought he would catch the woodchuck, the boy who was digging frantically at the hole replied:

Catch him? I've got to catch him; Sunday's coming and there is no meat in the house.

Election day is coming and the Democratic party has no issues. [Laughter.] Pass this bill, establish peace and a stable government in the Philippines, and all their labors to make an issue of "imperialism" will have been in vain.

PAREGORIC.

A short time ago they thought they had an issue. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the Democratic leader upon this floor, joyously launched the charge that a certain man named Christmas had obtained or tried to obtain from the Danish Government a half million dollars or so for the purpose of buying up somebody or something in the United States with reference to the sale of the Danish Islands. From the note of exultation in his voice and gleam of hope in his eye it was apparent that he felt that the Democratic party had at last found an issue—that it had, so to speak, struck oil. His position to-day, in view of the utter collapse of his charges, reminds me of a client of mine, the necessities of whose large family, recently augmented by twins, forced him into financial straits. He came to me one day joyfully declaring that he had found oil floating upon the surface of the water of a spring upon a small farm which he owned. The bottle in which he brought a sample had evidently seen family use. I sent it to an expert to analyze, and in a few days received his brief report, which dashed to earth the hopes of my client and myself. He simply said: "Find no trace of oil. Think your friend has struck paregoric." [Laughter.]

In his remarks upon this floor the other day that same Democratic leader, in that same address, said:

If I were called upon to name the agency or factor in American affairs at this time most dangerous to our institutions and threatening to their permanency, I would name the trusts.

He also said:

It should be borne in mind, too, that they constitute a new element in our trade and business operations and experience.

He also declared the Dingley tariff bill to be the parent of trusts. He has a short memory.

If the Democratic party in the coming campaign shall try to make the trust question one of their "gaudy issues," if they bore for oil in the trust field, they will strike something more bitter than paregoric. They will turn up the trust record of their own party. They will indeed find oil, because that trust, the pioneer of trusts, the best managed, the most prosperous and successful, and one of the largest of all trusts, existed before either of the Cleveland Administrations. What did our Democratic brethren do to curb that trust? Nothing whatever, save to select from its membership two United States Senators and one Cabinet minister.

The gentleman from Tennessee has a short memory. Trusts are not a new issue. Away back in 1888, when Grover Cleveland was President and the Democrats had a majority in this House, the Committee on Manufactures, whose membership embraced such Democratic leaders as William L. Wilson, William D. Bynum and Clifton R. Breckinridge, was authorized and instructed to investigate trusts and report what should be done to regulate, control, and suppress them. That committee made a partial report July 22, 1888, in which, after stating that they had taken a large amount of testimony concerning the sugar trust, the oil trust, the whisky trust, and the cotton-bagging trust, they said:

Your committee further report that the names of various combinations and trusts have been from time to time furnished to your committee; that the number of such combinations is very large.

That was their report to a Democratic Congress in 1888, and yet the gentleman from Tennessee says trusts constitute a new element. They continued investigating at an expense of some $10,000 to the taxpayers of the country, and finally, March 2, 1889, submitted their final report, in which they said:

We respectfully report that the number of combinations and trusts formed and forming in this country is, as your Commission ascertained, very large, and affect a large portion of the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country. * * * Your committee respectfully reports that, owing to difference of opinion between the members of the committee, they limit this report to submitting to the careful consideration of subsequent Congresses the facts shown in the testimony taken before the committee.

The gentleman from Tennessee tells us that trusts constitute a new element, but that was the report of a Democratic committee made thirteen years ago to a Democratic House, which did not even attempt to curb this factor which we are now told is so—dangerous to our institutions and threatening to their permanency.

In 1893 the Democratic party came again in full power, having the President and both Houses of Congress. I challenge the gentleman from Tennessee to tell me one thing that during those four years his party did to curtail the growing power and acts of trusts.

In the Fifty-second Congress William Jennings Bryan, the Democratic standard bearer of the last two Presidential campaigns, then a member of Congress, did introduce two bills relating to trusts. He had them referred to the Ways and Means Committee, of which he was a member, and upon which the Democrats had a majority, and there allowed them to sleep the sleep that knows no waking, or would have known none had not the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] unearthed and exposed them during the pendency of trust legislation in the last Congress.

I remember that during the special session of 1897, while the Dingley tariff bill was upon its passage in this House, a distinguished Democrat from Tennessee, now governor of that State, declared his great pride in the fact that while a member of the Tennessee legislature he had assisted in bringing into life the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company, which, he declared, could and would without the aid of any tariff put the Pennsylvania coal and iron companies out of business, and was already sending its products not only into Pennsylvania, but to foreign countries.

I had the curiosity to look up that concern, and to my surprise found that it was the result of the combination of some 15 or 20 different rival corporations, thus constituting what is popularly called a "trust." I hope it is one of those which the gentleman from Tennessee says he has upon his list. And as it is particularly within the province and authority of the State of Tennessee to regulate that great concern, I hope that the gentleman will see that it is immediately done, so that it may not destroy our Pennsylvania industries.

The gentleman from Tennessee had a short memory also when he declared the tariff responsible for trusts. He forgot that the earliest and, as I have said, one of the greatest and I believe the best managed and most successful of all the trusts, namely, the oil trust, deals exclusively in a product upon which there is not now and never has been any tariff whatever. Perhaps he wished to forget it. Certainly he does not wish to injure it, because of its important Democratic membership.

Perhaps he purposely forgot also that another great trust, officered, owned, and controlled by some of the most notable Democrats in the United States, does not owe its parentage to any Republican tariff. So far as I know, there has never been any tariff on ice.

Perhaps he purposely forgot also that the chairman of the Democratic national committee during the last two Presidential campaigns was the president of the great cotton-bale trust.

He may forget, but the people have long memories, and when the Democratic party attempts to parade that issue, its sixth sense will need to be in good working order, for its pathway is strewn with the insurmountable obstacle of its own past record.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress, in 1900, the Republican party introduced and supported in this House an amendment to the Constitution providing that "Congress shall have power to define, regulate, control, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise." Being an amendment to the Constitution, it required a two-thirds vote. The gentleman from Tennessee and every other Democratic member in this House, save five, voted against, and thus defeated it.

At the very outset of the same address the gentleman from Tennessee startled us by the information that there is now greater harmony in the Democratic party than at any time within the past eight years. We have all noted how, at the recent harmony gathering in New York, the bright particular star was a man who, more than any other, has during the past five years been the subject of abuse upon the Democratic side of this House, and of whose election to the Presidency a Democratic member within the past thirty days has declared upon this floor to have been the greatest calamity that ever befell the American people. While this new harmony deal brings Cleveland to the front, it apparently relegates to the rear the Democratic idol of two campaigns, for William Jennings Bryan was not invited and was not present. To-day he has issued a statement declaring his view of that kind of harmony.

The sixth sense of the gentleman from Tennessee was not in good working order and he certainly ran his head against a brick wall when he attempted to take the Republican party to task for not having accomplished more since it came into power in 1897, for he invited a comparison between conditions now and those which existed when William McKinley was inaugurated March 4, 1897, and a comparison of the record of adversity under the preceding Democratic Administration with the record of prosperity under Republican rule. When President Cleveland and a Democratic Congress came into power in March, 1893, there were employed on the railways of this country 876,602 men. Within one year from that date there had been mustered out 93,994, an army of railway men larger than the army which fought the battle of Gettysburg, and never during the four years of Democratic administration did the number of railway employees grow to within 50,000 of the number previously employed at the close of President Harrison's term.

When President McKinley came into office in 1897 there were 823,476 railway employees. In one year the number grew to 874,558, an increase of 51,082. By June 30, 1900, the grand total had been increased to 1,017,653, an increase in three years of 194,177 men. That is the last date to which the Interstate Commerce Commission can give accurate information, but the number has since largely increased.

In 1897, the last year of Democratic rule, the compensation paid railway employees was $465,601,581. By 1900 there had been an increase of $112,663,263 in the annual pay of railway employees, the total paid in that year being $577,264,841. The prosperity of railways is an index to the prosperity of the entire country. The increase of employees and in wages in mines and factories has been even greater proportionately than in railways, and it is no exaggeration to say that 3,000,000 of men who were idle under Democratic administration find employment at good wages to-day.

In 1897, the last year of Democratic Administration, the expenses of the Government exceeded its receipts by $18,524,455. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, the receipts exceeded the expenditures by $77,717,985. By 1897 a Democratic administration of four years had succeeded in frightening capital out of the country to such an extent that the circulation per capita was reduced to $22.87, the total amount in circulation being $1,640,209,519. June 1, 1902, the amount in circulation was $2,254,415,975, an increase of $614,206,456, and the per capita of circulation was $28.54.

In 1896, the last full year of Democratic administration, there were 15,088 business failures in the United States, involving aggregate liabilities of $226,096,134.

In 1901 there were 11,002 failures, with aggregate liabilities of $113,092,376. With 67,263 more business concerns in operation in 1901 than in 1896, there were over 4,000 less failures. To put it differently, the percentage of failures in 1896 was 1.31 per cent, but in 1901 less than nine-tenths of 1 per cent. We have an average of 4,000 less business failures every year under Republican administration, and an average of $100,000,000 less of liabilities involved in such failures every year.

When the Republican party came into power in 1897 commercial and financial fear, distrust, and disaster, and the consequent personal suffering, distress, and almost starvation of thousands were the prevailing conditions. All this has been changed as by the wand of the magician. Business confidence is restored, our commerce is greater, and our people more prosperous than ever before. If our Democratic friends can make capital by referring to these matters, they are welcome to do so.

Surely the party—the Administration—whose policy has showered these blessings upon our people at home can be more safely trusted to administer to the wants of the people of the Philippines than can the party which has shown itself so incapable of administering our own domestic affairs.

The bill proposed by the minority means a complete renunciation by the United States of the duties and responsibilities which, in the providence of God, have been cast upon us. It means a cowardly retreat. It means that we shall be degraded and disgraced in the eyes of all the world. It means something that the American people will never tolerate. On the other hand, the bill we present and propose to pass maintains the honor and dignity of the American people, enables us to carry out our own treaty obligations to maintain peace and good order in the Philippines and to be more instrumental and effective in maintaining peace throughout the world. At the same time it enables the Filipinos to participate as fully as possible in the blessings of our republican form of government. It gives them more of independence of action, more of self-government than they ever have enjoyed or ever expected to achieve. It is all that they demand—all that they are capable of enjoying. When we have passed it, then, in the language of the Prophet Isaiah, "Let them give glory unto the Lord and declare His praise in the islands." [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Virginia has consented that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] may proceed at the present time. I yield to the gentleman for one hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I shall speak upon a matter not involved in the pending bill, at least for a portion of my time. I do not think it is necessary that I should apologize for coming before the House of Representatives and incidentally, perhaps, before a large audience to speak about a matter which has attracted a great deal of the attention of the people of this country.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], on the 17th of April last, took advantage, as I am now taking advantage, of general debate in the House, to attack, in a manner peculiar to himself, and which I do not care especially to criticise, the Speaker of the House, the Committee on Rules, and the organization of the House. I do not care to go into the special things that he said, because he has succeeded in making his speech the basis of current assaults upon the House of Representatives, and to have attracted the attention of the people of the whole country by the denunciation with which that speech is filled. His speech has been widely circulated—by whom I do not know and I do not care—but it, like every other matter of denunciation of somebody and pointing out to the people of the country some danger it is threatened by, has attracted very wide attention.

Silence on the part of those charged with the misuse of official position and arbitrary assumption of unauthorized power would be very naturally construed as admission of the justice of these assaults, and hence duty demands that response be made.

The press of the country has been teeming with these denunciations, and I have before me a long list of newspaper condemnations of the House. Several of them, one especially, with a most attractive head line "The passing of the Speaker." Another, "The degradation of the House of Representatives." Still another, "The danger to civil liberty in the organization of the House of Representatives." Following that gentleman's speech my colleague, Mr. GILL, from one of the Ohio districts—and some of you know him by sight—took occasion not only to denounce the organization of the House, but the Committee on Rules, and coupled his statement with the statement that the House was an oligarchy, and that it was impossible for an ordinary member of the House to secure any action upon any bill.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] standing on his feet, with that enthusiastic condition that comes over him when a question of that character is on his mind, also denounced the House of Representatives and its organization, and not only so, but went out before the public with a newspaper article, very ably written, of course, denouncing in the same sort of language the organization of the House of Representatives, and notably the Committee on Rules.

In the State of Ohio substantially all the Democratic newspapers have taken up the cry and have warned the people of the horrors that are just ahead of them if they do not in some way rouse up and combat this oppression. My colleague, in accepting a nomination for a second term in his district, published in his speech the larger part of the speech of the gentleman from Washington. Quite an improvement it was, in matter of rhetoric and eloquence, I confess; and that went the rounds of the newspapers and press of Ohio, was widely circulated and widely commented upon. It became the text for a great many Democratic editorials.

I do not stand here to-day for the purpose of having a personal controversy with the gentleman from Washington. Individually he cuts a very insignificant figure as compared with the greater fact that he has sent forth to the world at large a studied arraignment of the Speaker and the House. This gives to his remarkable utterances unusual interest. I have no personal controversy with him. I have been his friend always. I have in my possession a letter from his committee thanking me for the laborious efforts I made for his election. I had entered into that matter because of certain conditions that surrounded us here in the House of Representatives, and I had nothing but the most friendly feeling for him, and never, on any occasion, could he have asked a favor of me that I would not have cordially and willingly granted. So his attack upon me, not only put forth upon the floor of the House with bitterness and vindictiveness that marked every utterance that related to me, but its repetition in other localities, called my attention to the character of the assault. I care nothing about that.

If nobody was interested in this matter but myself I would not be heard in defense. But there are others; not only the gentlemen who furnish the personnel of the committee organization of the House, but furthermore the honor and integrity of the House of Representatives. This is the most representative body in all the world—a body that comes directly every two years from the ultimate source of all political power, coming directly from the people. In our representative capacity we control the destinies of the present and future of a great nation. To send it forth to the world that that body of men is under the control of an oligarchy that oppresses the people and suppresses debate and strangles needed consideration of bills and measures is a matter of very considerable importance, not alone to the members in this House, but in a much larger degree to the people of the United States. It furnishes an element of assault throughout the world upon the success of free institutions. It has already brought out sneering comment from newspapers in other countries.

Now, I do not care to read any of this attack, for I do not care to give it any wider circulation than it has had already, but I propose here to place in the RECORD, and use it as a part of my speech, an argument in favor of the present organization of the House of Representatives, prepared by our very distinguished and very able clerk to the Speaker, Mr. Hinds. You know to whom I refer. He is probably to-day—so far as the matter of detail is concerned—the best posted parliamentarian in the United States. [Applause.] I am not putting in competition the great minds that have presided in this House, to whom I shall refer later, or so far as the independent physiological consideration and discussion and settlement of questions of parliamentary law are concerned; but in so far as discussion properly relates to the history of legislation, to the parliamentary history of the United States, now nearly a century and a quarter old, I would refer to Mr. Hinds, and defer to him in preference to any other man in the country. [Applause.] I am glad to make this reference to him.

He has furnished—not at my suggestion, but he has given me the benefit of it—a statement in regard to this subject of the criticism of the rules of the House.

Before I come to that, however, I desire to say that there is no more democratic place in all the parliamentary history of this or any other country than the period of time when the House of Representatives debates rules for its organization at the beginning of a Congress.

In the organization of this Congress, as in the organization of the Fifty-fourth, the Fifty-fifth, and the Fifty-sixth, we had gentlemen here—wise men, men whom I recognize as men of ability—who differed with the majority of the House upon the question of the propriety of these rules, and effort to change them was made.

I may say very briefly, in addition to the paper of Mr. Hinds, that the Fiftieth Congress demonstrated to all the world and to every member of that House that there must be a radical, far-reaching change in the rules of the House of Representatives. We had become not an oligarchy, not an organization of tyranny and oppression, but we had become a powerless body—a body that could not do business. We had grown from a small number up to the number of the present organization of the House, or nearly so; and I remember very well—and there are other gentlemen here on the floor who remember it as well as I do—when for nearly nine days—for more than eight days—we stayed in this House by day and by night—holding long night sessions, sometimes all night—for the sole and simple purpose of coming to a vote upon a question that had been widely discussed and as to which everybody absolutely understood all there was bearing upon it.

It was the question of the refunding of the direct tax. It had been discussed and, as I have said, understood, and when we undertook to force a vote upon it we were obliged to waste absolutely somewhere between eight or nine days because we could not, by any process furnished to us by the rules of the House, bring about a vote on that important question. It then became apparent that some radical changes in the rules must be made.

In the Fifty-first Congress, this organization, substantially what we have now, was made. There was a good deal of criticism of it upon the Democratic side; but in the Fifty-second Congress and in the Fifty-third Congress that party, with the same intelligence which it has always had, followed in the footsteps of the Republican party ultimately and adopted in essence our rules. From that day to this, as I have already said, there have been repeated efforts to amend these rules, and I want to point out now with what grace it comes from two members of this House to now condemn the principles upon which these rules are established.

At the beginning of this Congress, following the election of the Speaker of the House and the other elective officers of the House, a motion was made to adopt for the government of the Fifty-seventh Congress the rules of the Fifty-sixth Congress. Our friends on the other side made about the usual opposition; and finally, in a full debate in which more than one Republican participated, and in which there were strong utterances in opposition to some of the provisions of the proposed rules, and, among other things, a strong attack made upon the small number of the Committee on Rules, and an attack made upon the source of their appointment as well—because the claim has been made many a time that the Speaker ought not to be intrusted with the appointment of the Committee on Rules, that the appointment ought to be made by the House of Representatives—all this was discussed fully. And there were here in this House two gentlemen who had served all the way through the Fifty-sixth Congress; that is, their names had been on the roll of the House.

They were present when the debate took place. They knew, or had the opportunity to know, all there was of oligarchy, all there was of tyranny, all there was of oppression in those rules, for they had served under them for two sessions of Congress and their memory was again refreshed by the able attacks which were made, not only on the other side, but on this side, against those rules; yet I find that when a motion was made by the gentleman from Tennessee to commit these rules to the Committee on Rules again for the purpose of reorganization and for the purpose of eliminating these oppressive features, as they are called, both these gentlemen—one of them the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], and I will call attention to another gentleman who has attacked the whole business here—possibly not so much the rules as the mode of their administration—on a direct yea-and-nay vote upon the question whether there should be a change in these rules or not the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GILL] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] all voted with their party against the change in the rules of the House. This was their opportunity, and they failed to avail themselves of it. I say they are now estopped to complain.

And now I am going to show you before I get through what a meager opportunity these gentlemen, at least some of them, have had to know how oppressive these rules have been during the organization of the Fifty-seventh Congress. They were here. They had served two sessions. Were they unintelligent? Did they not know what was wrong with the rules of the House? Had they not had sufficient time to ascertain what was the matter? Yet we find that after full debate here upon the floor of the House, they voted for the readoption of the old rules of the Fifty-fourth, of the Fifty-fifth, the Fifty-sixth, and now the rules of the Fifty-seventh Congress.

It strikes me that these gentlemen are effectually estopped—and it is an estoppel in pais, as the lawyers would say—from coming here now and protesting against the rules that they deliberately voted for, with a full knowledge of all that had been said by much abler men, possibly, than any of us, on the question of these rules. By what principle of fairness do these gentlemen complain of rules they voted for?

So now, Mr. Chairman, I want to show to the House how little there is in the complaints that are made in regard to this matter.

And, Mr. Chairman, having said that, I would, if time permitted, read this argument made by Mr. Hinds; but for lack of time I will, without objection, incorporate it at the proper place in my remarks. It will be a valuable document for the perusal of gentlemen of the House of Representatives.

The following is the able paper of Mr. Hinds:

Criticism of the rules of the House of Representatives, both in the House itself and in the columns of the press, is by no means a phenomenon of present political conditions. Even in those early days, now fondly referred to as the better days of the Republic, the rules came in for their share of the criticism which freemen so delight to mete out to their institutions and statesmen. The vigorous tongue of John Randolph, of Virginia, disported itself fully as much at the expense of the rules of procedure as at the business methods of the great Speaker, who in that early day realized that a legislative body should first of all be able to legislate.

Present criticisms are directed almost entirely at the Committee on Rules, which is represented as exercising tyranny, variously compared to the most notable of the historic tyrannies. And present criticism is probably milder than has been known in the last ten years of the committee's activities. Yet the Rules Committee has continued its duties, whether one party or the other has controlled, and no serious attempt has been made on the floor of the House either to reform or abolish it.

It is evident that an institution so freely denounced and so unanimously upheld must have about it some things worth studying. Nor will an examination of the functions of the committee consume much space or great time.

Nearly every American is familiar with the procedure of the ordinary society or lodge meeting, where there is abundant time to transact all the business and hear every member who wishes to speak. There is a freedom and ease of action in such a meeting that renders drastic rules unnecessary. But give one of these delightful little assemblies twice as much business as it can transact in the time before it, and three or four times as many debaters desiring the floor as can be heard. Everyone understands what turmoil and confusion would ensue.

More than half a century ago the House of Representatives found itself in precisely this condition, and one of the means of relief was a rule establishing an ironclad order of business providing that reports of committees and other business should be taken up only in a fixed order. This helped along the public business by substituting order for chaos. Legislative propositions marched up for consideration in single file instead of as a mob.

But as the years went on the file grew so long that many measures would be waiting in line when the Congress expired. Sometimes important bills, even great measures appropriating supplies of money for the Government, would be left in line, blocked by less important measures ahead of them.

It took the House a long time to devise a satisfactory system whereby certain bills, because of their importance, might be allowed to step out of their place in the file and march to the front while other bills waited. The perplexities attending this reform were some such as those which attend the establishment of rules of precedence in social affairs; but the House has finally settled the problem in a fairly satisfactory way. It was evident to all that common sense required that the general appropriation bills should be allowed to step out of the file and move to the front at any time. It was also easy to set aside one day in the week when bills for the benefit of private individuals should be allowed to come to the front, on condition that on all other days of the week they should give way to bills relating to public affairs.

In later years a few other distinctions have been established whereby bills of importance greater than that of the common kind have been given precedence.

But as more than 15,000 bills demand the attention of the House in a Congress, and as the House can not act on 3,000, it is evident that with all the rules of precedence there remain 12,000 bills that wait in vain.

In former years the line of hopeless waiters was not so large, not because the House did more business, for it did less, but because the demands of the country were not so great. Yet there has always been a fierce struggle for precedence among the bills of the common kind as distinguished from the privileged kind.

The first device for rescuing worthy measures from the crowd of the hopeless was the motion to suspend the rules fixing the order of business so as to enable the House to take up a particular bill. For obvious reasons it was established that such a motion should require a two-thirds vote. Even with that restriction the use of the motion became so great as to threaten to take all the time of the House. So the motion to suspend the rules was limited to certain days, until now it is in order only on two days each month.

It is obvious that the motion to suspend the rules was an imperfect device. A bill very important and desirable might be unable to command a two-thirds vote, although it could easily get a majority.

So the problem was to enable the House to rescue a worthy measure by a majority vote. It is obvious that if it was to be done by motion from the floor, every member would be making the motion, and so the order of business would be abandoned in favor of mob order, wherein the only regulating force would be the autocratic recognitions of the Speaker. Even the motion to suspend the rules had once fallen into this sad condition.

It was a natural and reasonable idea to provide that a motion so liable to abuse should require the approval of a committee before it should be made on the floor. There had been a Committee on Rules since the earliest days of the House, of which the sole function had been to report a system of rules at the beginning of a Congress and amendments from time to time. And it was quite a natural thing that to this committee should be referred motions for the consideration of bills that seemed unlikely to be reached in the order fixed by the rules. The origin of this device dates back nearly if not quite twenty-five years. The House dropped into the practice quite naturally and unconsciously, and it was only when the existence of rampant obstruction caused the Committee on Rules to prescribe the method of consideration as well as to afford the opportunity for consideration that the House and the country became aware of the system.

While obstruction of business was the fashion of partisan warfare in the House the Committee on Rules would not only report a rule giving a bill a time for consideration, but would at the same time fix the length of debate and the time of voting. Since both political parties made use of drastic restrictive orders of this kind it is evident that they were considered necessary. In the present Congress such orders have been comparatively rare, and where they have appeared restrictive generally the provisions have been so liberal as to give ample time for consideration. The most elaborate restrictive order of the present Congress was that providing for the consideration of the bill for the government of the Philippine Islands; yet in reality it was so liberal that the House agreed to it by unanimous consent.

In conclusion, two facts should be remembered:

1. That the Committee on Rules recommends to the House, but does not dictate. It may propose a special order, but that order can be adopted only by a majority vote of the members of the House.

2. That the Committee on Rules officiates, and is expected to officiate, only in relation to a very small proportion of the total number of bills passed by the House.

In recent years the House in a Congress has passed about 2,200 bills. Of the 14,000 or more bills introduced the various committees of the House report about 2,800, and these go to the calendars or docket. Fully 2,000 of them are private bills, in order for consideration on Fridays, and no one has ever expected the Committee on Rules to assist them. They come up in their own right for consideration. About 265 are public bills not requiring appropriation of money, which are in order in the first portion of a period called the morning hour, but not limited to sixty minutes. It is never expected that the Committee on Rules shall assist these bills, as they reach consideration readily in the regular order.

There remain, then, about 375 bills which go to the so-called Union Calendar. It is because of these bills that the criticisms of the Committee on Rules mainly arise. It is difficult to take up a bill on the Union Calendar unless it is privileged. About 25 of them are privileged, but there remain 350 in a position of difficulty. A few of them are of general public importance, but the greater number are really of local interest, much desired by the constituents of certain members but not generally objects of interest to the people of the whole country.

Any one of these 350 bills may be reached in the regular order of business without the aid of the Speaker or the Committee on Rules, because in the second period of the morning hour a motion to go to the Union Calendar to consider one or all of them may be made, and there is no doubt that the Speaker must entertain it. The motion once made may be carried by a majority vote.

It may be objected that the multitude of privileged bills in fact keeps the House from the morning period, and thus causes its advantages to be nominal rather than real. But the House may at any time, through the nondebatable question of consideration, set aside privileged matters by majority vote, and then the morning period results automatically.

That the House may thus at any time take up for consideration any bill before it, without assistance or even consent from the Speaker or Committee on Rules, shows that the committee is not actually a parliamentary dictatorship but a convenience, more reasonable and useful than the motion to suspend the rules.

When the critics of the Rules Committee are confronted with such a presentation of the case they reply, "True, but the bills in which we are interested are not such as to cause the House to side track the appropriation bills in order to consider them. So we are helpless unless the Rules Committee assist us." But should the Rules Committee be expected to assist in displacing great public measures in order to forward legislation in which the House—and presumably the country also—takes so little interest?

In a Congress about 125 of the 350 nonprivileged Union Calendar bills are considered without aid from the Committee on Rules. About 25 are aided by that committee, and about 200 are left among the thousand or more reported bills that the House fails to reach.

The 12,000 bills not reported by committees are not expected to be considered in the House, and the Committee on Rules is not to be criticised on account of them. Their status of hopelessness dates far back to a period long before the present functions of that committee began.

So it may be claimed fairly, and without fear of contradiction, that the criticisms of the Committee on Rules for not bringing bills to the consideration of the House arises because of the 200 Union Calendar bills which fail. Any one of those bills might be passed in the regular order if a majority of the House could be induced to take interest in it. That being impossible, the member interested in the bill importunes the Committee on Rules to use their machinery to give his measure an easy launching. But the Speaker and his four associates on the committee are exercising a public trust for the general benefit, and it is their duty to weigh the measure well before assisting it.

A man does not have to be a philosopher, or even to have lived long in the world, to realize that a committee which has to say no to so many must, from time to time, be made the target of bitter criticism. That such criticism is not founded on justice seems to be proven amply by the fact that in ten years no serious attempt has been made in the House either to abolish or modify the functions of the committee.

Now, what is the difficulty? It is claimed, as I have already read, and my colleague [Mr. GILL], in his speech accepting his nomination, said with approval what Mr. CUSHMAN had said, as follows:

It is with humiliation unspeakable that I rise in my place on this floor and admit to my constituents at home that in this House I am utterly powerless to bring any bill or measure, no matter how worthy or meritorious it may be, to a vote unless I first consult the Speaker.

Why, Mr. Chairman, that is exceedingly adroit language, exceedingly adroit. Of course he must consult the Speaker. We have not an organization of chaos here. There is not anybody here who can do anything when the House is in session without addressing the Speaker of the House, but the inference and the intention and purpose was to show that a member of this House was powerless to bring about action upon any measure unless the Speaker was in favor of that measure, and included in that criticism comes the denunciation of the Committee on Rules.

Now, I want to say this: I venture to say that no committee invested with that great power, which I admit is nominally vested in the Committee on Rules, has ever been as free from the use of that power against the purposes of the majority of this House as has been the Committee on Rules of the Fifty-seventh Congress. Let us see. We have had some very sanguine battles on this floor, battles upon great questions. Let me enumerate three of them. The Pacific cable, the oleomargarine bill, and the irrigation bill, two of the three going, as it is claimed and as I claim, right to the root of our Government, and introducing into the Government new principles of legislation. I am not here now to criticise any one of those bills. I state this without going into detail. There was not one of those bills that received more than one vote of the five members of the Committee on Rules, as I understand it. I know that the oleomargarine bill had but a single voice in its favor among the five members of the Committee on Rules.

The bill of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] had but a single voice in its favor, and that voice was of very doubtful import and power. As to the irrigation bill, I believe there was but one member of the committee who voted for it, certainly three of the committee did vote or would have voted against it; and there are the three great questions that we have had—nonpolitical in their character—every one of them vastly important to the people of the United States, and the Committee on Rules could have strangled any one of those bills. Take the oleomargarine bill, which, in my opinion, was the most offensive of them all, and we had that bill twice where it could have been strangled and destroyed in the Committee on Rules—once before the time was given for its original passage, and the second time when they were compelled to have a rule of the House in order to bring it out and settle the differences between the two Houses.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman think that the Senate about destroyed the oleomargarine bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope so. I am only referring to it now to point out the fairness of the Committee on Rules and to show that criticism of the committee is unjust. I have only pointed out these three great epochs here to show you that the Committee on Rules of this House has never undertaken to strangle the voice of any one of the members of this House in any manner pertaining to legislation. I have only referred to three; there have been many more of them. Our Democratic friends on that committee, as a matter of course, are not expected to coincide with the Republican majority upon questions of politics, but upon every other question, and I challenge the gentlemen—I do not challenge them, but I refer to them with high respect and high regard, and they will bear me out in it that their voice has had as much weight in framing the rules and deciding the questions that have come before us as any Republican member of the committee. In the argument made by Mr. Hinds, which I shall incorporate, you will find the reasons why we must have a Committee on Rules or else we must have chaos and how very few now of all the bills that come into this House come at last or at first or at any time from the Committee on Rules. There are but a very few of them. Let us see, now. All the bills coming from the Committee on Ways and Means for the raising of revenue are privileged bills to come before the House upon the motion and suggestion of the committee itself.

All the appropriation bills, carrying these mighty sums of money, come before the House without the consent of any man except the chairman of the committee, sustained by the majority of the Committee on Appropriations. The resolutions relating to printing, the resolutions relating to the expenditure of the contingent fund of the House, and a long line of other bills come here as matters of privilege. And then, too, when the two Houses have acted and a difference arises, these rules specifically provide that the report of a committee of conference is of the highest privilege.

Again, all contested-election cases are privileged. And then, again, the rules provide for the setting apart of the days that are allotted to the District of Columbia, to the Committee on Claims, to the Pension Committee, and the Committee of Invalid Pensions. All these are outside of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules; and when you come to look into it you will see how very small a proportion of all the bills that come from the membership of this House and percolate through the committees and come back onto the Calendars of the House are affected in anywise or come in anywise under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules.

How are you going to carry on the legislation of the House of Representatives without the action of this committee? Has anybody ever thought what we would have here without it? And now I want to point out another thing. The Speaker of the House is not present. I have served in this House under four Speakers. Among them was Mr. Carlisle, than whom no fairer minded, no abler man ever occupied a seat in that distinguished chair. Then there was Mr. Reed, "Tom Reed," the great parliamentary leader; the able man; the patriotic man; then Mr. Crisp, a man I loved, a man whose lovable characteristics impressed themselves upon the House, a man without the experience of Carlisle and Reed, but a man with a mind to grasp these questions, and he and they were foremost and always ready to do the fair thing. I could select out of that trio of great men a marked difference in their treatment of the members of the House, but that is not important.

Now, I say, and I challenge contradiction, that the present Speaker of the House of Representatives has been indefatigable, untiring, in his purpose to treat all sides of this House and all the membership of this House with absolute fairness. [Applause.] Go over his decisions. It is very easy for gentlemen to carp and criticise. Find one of those decisions, if you can, that is not justified under parliamentary law and the parliamentary history of our country and the precedents written in the books. He is fair-minded, able, and careful. Why, it is said you must go to him with a bill in order to get the right to call it up by unanimous consent. Let me contrast the management and administration of this Congress and the last Congress with some of those that have gone before. I have sat here in my seat—for I have occupied this place all the time I have been in Congress, except one session, and then I sat in the row immediately behind this one—and I have seen 50 men on their feet with bills in their hands, holding them up and swinging them and crying out "Mr. Speaker!"

What was the cause of that? It was because of the lack of system and plan in the Speaker's own mind as to how he would administer this very delicate question of recognition for the purpose of asking unanimous consent. And upon his own motion, with his long experience in the House, he has adopted the system under which we are acting, which is this: He will not recognize any man to ask unanimous consent for a bill twice over if objection has been made, unless there is some good reason shown in the merit of the bill itself; and in order to ascertain that he must read the bill and read the report and talk with the member; and I do not ask any man to respond to what I am going to say, but was there ever a member of this House now under the sound of my voice who went to the Speaker and asked him to allow a bill to be called up by unanimous consent that the Speaker refused to examine into the merits of the bill that he brought to him?

Then what next? Bear in mind, gentlemen, that these bills that come up by unanimous consent are not the proper subject of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules. That committee has nothing to do with those bills. Now, suppose that the Speaker was this arbitrary person that was denounced by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], and suppose he saw fit to have favorites in the House; how easy it would be simply to recognize men on this side and to single out his special friends. I stand here to challenge any man to say if the Democratic members of this House, in proportion to their numbers, have not had, for this matter of recognition to ask unanimous consent, an equal opportunity with this side of the House. The record will bear me out that I am absolutely correct. And that is not all of it, Mr. Chairman. I will put into the RECORD the names of the members who have had unanimous consent by the recognition of the Speaker, and the number of the unanimous consents that they have had. Fortunately we have a RECORD that rises a little higher in verity than the memory of disappointed gentlemen on the floor of this House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is purely a question. The gentleman is making an interesting speech. I do not desire to interrupt him in that, but I desire to ask him this: Does the gentleman feel that it is right, just, or legal to permit any Speaker, regardless of who the Speaker is, whether a Democrat or a Republican, to have it in his power to say that he will or will not give you recognition to ask for unanimous consent to consider a bill in this House? Again, one more question: Does the gentleman feel that it is right to the people of this country to put it in the hands of the Committee on Rules the power to say what shall and what shall not be considered in this House?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, of course; I say yes to both those questions. That is what I am here and making this speech for. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I did not suppose that I had not been understood. I can not yield any more, Mr. Chairman. I must apologize to the House. I thought I had been saying some things very plain, which would be understood.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman does not apologize to the House enough.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; I apologize to the House. I thought I had been exceedingly explicit and plain. [Renewed laughter.] What is the alternative of the gentleman's proposition? It is just what I have already described. Fifty gentlemen on their feet waving their bills, and the Speaker compelled to select one, and all the rest are dissatisfied. What do we have now? Absolute order. The Speaker indicates to a gentleman, first on this side, perhaps, then on the other, and then alternatively back and forth with absolute equality—I say with absolute equality, as I will show in my exhibit to my speech.

The result of it is that we do twice the business in an hour's time under this procedure of the House—five times the amount; and that is not all of it. There has been a great deal of it. Because the Speaker did not recognize A and did recognize B, A objects, and then comes trouble and disorganization of the whole concern.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that an intelligent study and a patriotic consideration of the rules of the House to which I have referred will impress upon the minds of any gentleman the absolute fairness of those rules. Nobody proposes a change to get rid of these so-called obnoxious features.

Now, I want to apologize to the gentlemen who have made these attacks for apparently not quite understanding the rules. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GILL] in the Fifty-sixth Congress voted in the first session on 65 roll calls and was absent on 23 of them. In the second session he voted on 43 roll calls and was absent on 31. I can imagine if my friend had been here listening to the proceedings of the House constantly he would have been less severe in his assault upon the rules of the House. In this Congress we have had 58 roll calls. He has responded on 18 and was absent on 40. He is a man of large business, a manufacturer, and I know he can ill afford the time to stay here and watch the proceedings of this House. He is far more attached, apparently, more devoted to the business that seems to absorb him, and possibly if he will retire from business upon his ample fortune, which he has, and sit down here in the Fifty-eighth Congress—Republican House to be [applause]—under the old Reed rules, he will come to a better consideration of the rules of the House.

Now, the gentleman from Washington, not so much absorbed in business, but quite as unfortunate in his devotion to the business of the House—I think if he would give a little more attention and be a little more constantly in the House of Representatives, watching the procedure, that he would feel toward the rules—I seem to have lost my figures in some way by some unaccountable process of disappearance, but I shall be able to put them in the RECORD and show that his record of presence and absence is a much more startling one than that which I have referred to in the case of my distinguished colleague, and I hope that in the future he will grow better satisfied.

Now, I want to refer to another matter. Mr. CUSHMAN introduced 38 public bills; 8 were reported, and none passed or become laws. I am going to point out how an industrious and faithful young member of this House can get on. That was one of Mr. McKinley's great expressions. Everything that went well he called "getting on," and I want to show you how an industrious member of this House can "get on" without complaining. Now, I want to defend this House against any unfairness to the young, glorious State of Washington. I voted for its admission into the Union, and I have done everything I could to have it represented here in Congress by Republicans, sometimes not successfully; but it looks as if in the future we are going to have a better time in that respect than we have had heretofore. I have been very anxious that Washington should "get on." Here is what one of its Representatives has accomplished:

Mr. JONES of Washington introduced 46 public bills, 6 of which were reported, and 2 became laws. Mr. CUSHMAN introduced 58 private bills, 7 of which were reported, and 2 became laws. Mr. JONES of Washington introduced 17 private bills, 6 of which were reported, and 2 became laws.

Here is the record of the gentleman from Washington, Mr. JONES:

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

H. R. 12420, Wesley Brummett, pension bill, passed the House.
H. R. 12115, Chester Wadsworth, pension bill, passed the House.
H. R. 12370, Ida M. Briggs, pension bill, passed the House.
H. R. 159, extending provisions of free-homes bill to north half Colville Indian Reservation, passed the House.
H. R. 11725, amending navigation laws relating to register and enrollment of vessels, passed the House.
H. R. 8335, providing for building a bridge across the Columbia River at Vancouver, Wash., passed as Senate bill 4204.

This is aside from regular appropriation bills. Omnibus building bill increased Seattle from $750,000 to $900,000 and gave $60,000 each for sites at Spokane and Tacoma. Naval bill, in which he took special interest, carries over $1,100,000 for Puget Sound Navy-Yard.

H. R. 960, for relief of James C. Drake, covered by omnibus claims bill.

Aside from appropriations carried in general appropriation bills, as a matter of course.

FIFTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

Pension bill for Favel Van Eaton, became a law.
John B. Wetherbee, pension bill, became a law.
Julia Traynor, pension bill, became a law.
Abner S. Crawford, pension bill, became a law.
Thomas Paul, land-purchase bill, became a law.
John C. Smith, land-purchase bill, became a law.
H. R. 9140, extending homestead laws to Philippine soldiers, passed.
H. R. 4801, for relief of Joshua Roberts, passed as an amendment to one of the appropriation bills.
H. R. 11059, admitting Star of Bengal and Star of Italy, passed as Senate bill 4448.
H. R. ——, admitting steamship Garonne, passed as a Senate bill.
Bill appropriating $50,000 for repair of Thetis, passed as an amendment to an appropriation bill.
H. R. 5267, relating to lieu land selections, reported as amended by Public Land Committee, passed as amendment to sundry civil bill.
H. R. 7331, appropriating $300,000 for light and fog-signal stations in Alaska, was provided for in the two sundry civil bills.
Introduced bill increasing cost of public building at Seattle from $300,000 to $1,000,000, and in omnibus bill increase was made to $750,000.
Passed resolution for printing work entitled "Louisiana Purchase."
Secured amendment to sundry civil bill under which Army post at Spokane will be completed as a battalion post.
H. R. 8308, extending coal laws to Alaska, was incorporated in one of the general bills.

Now, I think if the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] had been present a little more in the House he would not only have got some more bills passed, but he would have had a better opinion of the House itself. In the Fifty-sixth Congress, the first session, there were 87 roll calls, on 70 of which Mr. CUSHMAN voted, and on 17 he failed to answer. You see he did pretty well; his record was high up in that Congress. Up to and including February 8, 1900, the first two months of the session, there had been 14 roll calls, 8 of which he missed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to hear that again. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Up to and including February 8, 1900, there had been 14 roll calls, 8 of which the gentleman missed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In justice to my colleague, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I think he was sick during a part of that time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And therefore he did not have an opportunity to feel so kindly toward the rules as if he had been here and understood them. But his illness was a sufficient excuse for those absences.

Now, it shows just this: That where a gentleman will be present and attend to business, he will have a better opportunity, I am arguing, to be favorable and friendly to the administration of the House than he will if he happens to be away and then feels that he has been unfairly treated.

Now, I said that an active, persistent, and energetic member could do a great deal of work. Now, let us see. Here is a new member that came in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and I have put his record in as illustrative of what one man can do by attention to his business. Aside from the appropriations carried in the general appropriation bill which went as a matter of course, and which my friend from Pennsylvania gave the entire credit to Mr. CUSHMAN, I want to say that his colleague, Mr. JONES, has done the following, as I have stated:

The record of this gentleman in both Congresses I have given. Why, all the members, 21 of us from the State of Ohio, have not accomplished in actual legislation one-half of what the gentleman, Mr. JONES of Washington, has accomplished for that State. [Applause.]

I think I may fairly stand here and say that the people from Washington have been not only liberally looked after, but most efficiently represented in this House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I appreciate the compliment the gentleman pays to me, but I desire the members of the House to know and realize that the members from the State of Washington are elected at large. We have no Congressional districts, we each represent the entire State, and I want to state that we work together upon all these matters, and I do not desire by my silence, here or elsewhere, to appropriate any credit for any of these matters, general appropriations or otherwise, that may be due to my colleague, because we have worked together and he is entitled to as much credit as myself. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. A striking exhibition of modesty and generosity which I commend to the consideration of others. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, the Committee on Rules has been unfortunate enough to oppose the building of a mint in the city of Tacoma, and I will put into my speech the letter of the Director of the Mint, indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury, stating emphatically and in clear language that they did not want any such building erected. And that is "the head and front," apparently, "of our offending"—that we did not have that bill brought in and passed. There are plenty of demands for public buildings, as we have all learned, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER], would not hesitate to indorse my statement that when a public building is asked for a special public purpose, and the head of the Department to which it is to be consigned protests against its erection, there has never yet been a committee of this House that would report such a bill to the House and seek its passage.

Mr. COCHRAN. Have you read the hearings before the Coinage Committee on that bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have them lying here on my desk.

Mr. COCHRAN. Do you not think the House of Representatives, not the Secretary of the Treasury, should pass upon such a question when facts are disputed and various interests are involved?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes; but when so many public buildings are asked for that are not needed, and when there are so many that are needed, I do not think we should force a building costing half a million dollars upon the Treasury Department, that does not want it.

Mr. COCHRAN. One further question, if the gentleman pleases. I direct his attention to the fact that in the testimony before the Coinage Committee it was made clearly apparent, I think, that little or no expense would be involved in operating the mint asked for by Mr. CUSHMAN'S bill, the saving of the transportation of the bullion to the mint at Philadelphia and the mint at San Francisco and other expenses now incurred by the Government being almost sufficient to defray the entire expense of the coinage of the bullion at the town of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And then it would become a perpetual expense that the officers of the Government say is not necessary.

Mr. COCHRAN. I say that the expense from year to year would be almost, if not entirely, covered by the saving of the expense now incurred in shipping bullion to other mints.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not the time to discuss that with the gentleman. It is enough to say that the Committee on Rules was met with the peremptory statement of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint that they did not want this building erected.

Mr. COCHRAN rose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, I will not discuss the matter any further. The official letters to which I refer are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 23, 1902.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On receipt of your letter of the 14th, inclosing House bill No. 68, and the report thereon, No. 482, being a bill to establish a United States mint at Tacoma, in the State of Washington, and requesting the views of this Department thereon, I submitted the same to Hon. George E. Roberts, Director of the Mint, and inclose you herewith his reply.

I have no doubt of the correctness of the facts stated by Mr. Roberts, and agree with his conclusions.

Very truly, yours,

L. M. SHAW.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Speaker House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, March 17, 1902.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: Referring to the inclosed communication from Hon. D. B. HENDERSON, Speaker of the House of Representatives, asking for your opinion upon House bill 68, to establish a mint at Tacoma, I beg to say:

The Government has recently completed a new structure in Philadelphia, which was occupied by the mint in October last. The building cost $2,000,000, and $440,000 is appropriated for equipment. When the equipment is completed this will be the largest and best mint in the world. There is also now under construction at Denver a mint for which $500,000 has been appropriated and for which the Supervising Architect is now asking $300,000 more. An appropriation of at least $150,000 will be required for the equipment of this institution. These two new mints, in connection with the mints at San Francisco and New Orleans, will afford ample facilities to do all the coinage that will be required for many years to come.

In a hearing held by the Coinage Committee upon a similar bill two years ago the Director of the Mint made a statement that when the receipts of the Seattle assay office reached the sum of $30,000,000 per year it might be as cheap to coin the bullion there or elsewhere on Puget Sound as to forward it to San Francisco. This without allowing for the cost of the establishment, which the Director was not prepared to estimate. The bullion receipts of the Seattle assay office have not, however, reached that figure, and there is no immediate prospect that they will.

With the completion of the Denver mint there is no reason why the Government may not have a rest from mint construction for some years. The appropriation named in the bill, $200,000, is inadequate for the construction and equipment of a mint, and would have to be followed by other and larger appropriations before coinage operations could be begun.

Respectfully, yours,

GEO. E. ROBERTS, Director of the Mint.

Mr. COCHRAN. Just one further question. Does the gentleman contend that the Committee on Rules should receive its instructions from a Department of the Government, rather than from the members advocating a particular measure, and who appeal to the judgment of their colleagues in support of it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not say anything of the kind. The best part of my answer, after all, is that we have reported so many bills that we were opposed to that the gentleman will find his argument will fall to the ground.

Mr. OLMSTED. Allow me one question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] stated, if I understood him, that the Committee on Rules opposed this mint bill. Now I wish to inquire whether they opposed it in any other way than by declining to bring in a special rule for taking up that bill ahead of all other legislation?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That was all. Here were 41 or 42 States of the Union and 2 or 3 Territories with bills recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and here was one of, I affirm, a hundred other bills not recommended by the committee that was sought to be brought in here against the judgment of the Treasury Department and against the judgment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and made a special order against the entire list of bills that had been consolidated into the so-called omnibus measure; and the action of the committee upon this particular bill was, after all, only a postponement of the measure, not a killing of it—simply a refusal to bring it in here at that time as a special order.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is it not true that under the existing rules and procedure of the House, even though a majority of the House may favor action on a bill, it can be (as bills have been under those circumstances) held up—refused consideration—because the Committee on Rules do not approve of it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There are too many prongs to that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCHRAN. It is all prongs.

Mr. GROSVENOR. First, I know of no bill as to which it was represented that there was a majority of the House in favor of it the consideration of which was refused by the Committee on Rules if it came within its jurisdiction.

Mr. COCHRAN. Have not petitions signed by a majority of members been presented to the Committee on Rules asking consideration of bills in vain?

Mr. GROSVENOR. What bills? Name them. Let us get right at the kernel of this matter.

Mr. COCHRAN. I can not name one just now. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think not. I will answer the gentleman's question when he knows anything about the bill to which his question relates.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will direct the gentleman's attention to a specific bill—the letter-carrier's bill. Was not that bill——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not that I have ever heard of, and that bill can come here under the call of the Post-Office Committee, that has had four or five opportunities to be heard during this session of Congress. That answers the gentleman.

Mr. COCHRAN. I think the bill has never been reported. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well, then. I know another bill that has never been reported.

Mr. COCHRAN. It could not be called up under the rules.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It can not be without an invasion of the entire practice of the House.

Mr. COCHRAN. I say it could not be called up under the rules, although the majority of this House desire it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It could not be without a deviation from the entire record and history of the Committee on Rules. But the Committee on Rules has nothing to do with it.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is here when they see fit to bring it, or put back to sleep the eternal sleep.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no such condition, as I have abundantly shown. Now, take this very bill, and I am glad the gentleman has referred to it. In the first place, that bill can come here by the report of the Post-Office Committee, and when it does come here it can be heard under the call of committees. That is the first way. The second is, the gentleman from Missouri is at liberty to demand to be recognized on suspension day and move to discharge the committee and pass the bill. The third is, whenever there is a call of the committees one hour is spent in the consideration of a single bill, which has happened 25 times during this Congress, and the gentleman can move to go into the Committee of the Whole, take up that bill and consider it, and I challenge the gentleman to show where the Committee on Rules of this House has ever taken hold of a bill of that character. That would be considered an invasion of the rights of the committees of the House. That would be the consideration of an attempt to supplant the action of the committees of the House.

I add now certain statements from the Journal and records of the House, and which will be very interesting to show the enormous work of the House.

The following shows what we have done in comparison with former Congresses:

Congress.	Reports to June.	Number of days.	Bills introduced.	Bills passed.			Pages of Journal.	Pages of Record.	Remarks.
				Public.	Private.	Total.
Fifty-second	1,535	251	10,337	237	200	437	....	5,040	Entire first session.
Fifty-third	935	357	9,076	307	134	441	....	5,744	Including extra session.
Fifty-fourth	2,105	193	10,639	223	270	493	613	6,137	Entire first session.
Fifty-fifth	1,465	175	10,547	279	444	723	705	5,546	To June 1.
Fifty-sixth	2,006	139	12,220	279	880	1,159	800	7,765	To June 7.
Fifty-seventh	2,591	139	15,187	262	1,592	1,854	....	7,547	To June 19.

The following shows the length of service of members of this House, which is important as reflecting upon the tables which follow:

[a] Chairman, 2. Weeks.
[b] Chairman, 2. Wachter.
[c] Chairman, 2. Roberts.
[d] Chairman, 2. Reeder.

CUSHMAN complained of the treatment accorded new members. He is serving his second term.

There are 168 first and second term members present. There are 65 committees of the House. With the total membership of the House 352, these 168 new members control 36 of these 65 committees.

They have 10 of the 17 members of the Committee on Agriculture, which reported the oleomargarine bill and the agricultural appropriation bill.

They control the following committees, having a majority of each of them:

Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, Education; Election of President, Vice-President, and Members of Congress; Elections No. 1, Elections No. 2, Elections No. 3, Enrolled Bills, Examination and Disposition of Documents, Expenditures in Agricultural Department, Expenditures in Interior Department, Expenditures in Navy Department, Expenditures in Post-Office Department, Expenditures in State Department, Expenditures in Treasury Department, Expenditures in War Department, Expenditures on Public Buildings, Immigration and Naturalization, Manufactures, Mileage, Militia, Mines and Mining, Pacific Railroads, Patents, Private Land Claims, Railroads and Canals, Reform in the Civil Service, Revision of Laws, Ventilation and Acoustics. They have also majorities on the following important committees: Claims; Coinage, Weights, and Measures; Indian Affairs, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Pensions, Public Lands, War Claims.

All told, there are 785 places on the House committees, 496 Republican and 289 Democratic. Of these the first and second termers have 373, 230 Republican and 143 Democratic. There are 168 first and second termers, 92 Republicans and 76 Democrats.

The 49 Republican first termers have 122 committee places; the 40 first-term Democrats have 77 places. Total, 89 first termers, 199 places.

The 43 second-term Republicans have 108 committee places; the 36 Democrats 66 places. Total, 43 second terms, 174 places.

Four second-term members have committee chairmanships, to wit: Reeder, Mileage, and one of the best committee rooms; Roberts, Examination and Disposition of Documents; Wachter, Enrolled Bills, with several clerks; Weeks, Elections No. 3, clerks,

There are 46 older Republican members of the House who do not have committee chairmanships. They are—

Third termers (28).—ALEXANDER, BOUTELL, BROWNLOW, BURLEIGH, BUTLER of Pennsylvania, CALDERHEAD, CAPRON, CONNELL, CRUMPACKER, GRAHAM, GREENE of Massachusetts, HAMILTON, LANDIS, LAWRENCE, LITTAUER, LONG, LOVERING, MANN, MONDELL, MORRIS, SHELDEN, SHOWALTER, SIBLEY, SAMUEL W. SMITH, SOUTHWICK, STEVENS of Minnesota, WATSON, YOUNG.

Fourth termers (11).—ACHESON, BARNEY, DAYTON, GIBSON, HENRY of Connecticut, HILL, HOWELL, JENKINS, MUDD, OTJEN, PRINCE.

Fifth termers (6).—ADAMS, BROMWELL, DOVENER, MCCALL, PARKER, VAN VOORHIS.

And BINGHAM, serving his twelfth term.

At the close of business June 9, 1902, there had been 2,417 committee reports made. Of these, 684 had been made by first-term members; 264 by second termers. Total for first and second termers, 948 out of 2,417.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress there were 385 recognitions for unanimous consent. The 89 present second termers, then first termers, had 68 of these recognitions. CUSHMAN had 4 of them.

To May, 1902, there had been 119 recognitions for unanimous consent in the Fifty-seventh Congress. Of these the first termers had had 14 and the second termers 25; total, 39.

The following shows the work of the first and second term members in this House. This record speaks too loudly to be drowned by mere detraction:

I append the following editorial from the Sioux City Journal. It is written by Hon. Mr. Perkins, for many years an able and distinguished member of this House:

THE HOUSE RULES.

Nothing in party management is more difficult than orderly procedure in the House of Representatives. The House is composed of 357 members, and with the next Congress will be increased to 386. Under the law each member is the equal of any other member. Each member has his own constituents; he is the representative of a district. Each member has individual responsibility to which his constituents hold him; he must care for their interests or meet condemnation. The pressure to do things in the House of Representatives is enormous.

Within a few days after the meeting of Congress the files of the various committees are full of bills. Many of these bills are the legacy which each Congress bestows upon its successor. No limit is placed upon the number of bills that may be introduced, and interested parties are pleased by receiving a copy of a printed bill, with the name of their member upon it, and with the information set forth on the title page that it has been referred to the committee for examination and report. Very soon the Calendar is choked. The time of the House is occupied with great appropriation bills and with measures of overshadowing importance. There must be lodged somewhere and in some fashion authority for the determination of the order of business. The House would run wild if left to itself. There must be lodged somewhere the power and the will to exercise arbitrary power. The members in the aggregate appreciate this and determine upon rules. The office of the Speaker is to enforce the rules; the office of the Speaker is to employ the rules to compel the House to do business.

The difficulty in the way of the orderly dispatch of business in the House of Representatives is chiefly in the relation which one side of the House sustains to the other. On all important issues it is the business of one side of the House to prevent affirmative action on the part of the other side of the House. The minority will take advantage under the rules to prevent the majority from recording the will of the majority. Thus arbitrary power must be located in the rules for which the Speaker and his Committee on Rules stand as the exponents. The real power is in the House itself, but it surrenders much of this power in the interest of orderly procedure and the public welfare.

If the individual member of the House could be trusted not to take advantage of his opportunity, nor to enter into combination with fellow-members in the service of local and personal ends, there would hardly be need of rules at all. If the minority side of the House could be trusted to deal fairly by the majority, forego filibustering and other wicked devices, the rules might without detriment to the rights of the majority or injury to the public service be much simplified. As it is the liberty of the individual must be abridged to conserve the general good. What war is is well understood; and politics in the House of Representatives is much the same thing.

The Fifty-first Congress, under the Speakership of Mr. Reed, was extremely turbulent; the Democratic side was frequently in a state of riot. But the Fifty-first Congress did business. The outcry, however, against the exercise of arbitrary power by the Speaker was never more intense. When the Democrats came into power with the succeeding Congress they sought to improve upon the rules, but their effort was short lived. The proudest political success of Mr. Reed was when the Democratic majority in effect adopted what were called his rules. The Democrats found this to be necessary in order to do business.

The speech of Mr. CUSHMAN the other day was catchy. Aside from its humor it was only a squeal. He has had his difficulties, as other members have their difficulties, and to lodge complaint against the Speaker and his aids in the government of the House is not unnatural, and is certainly the most convenient recourse. Speeches from the same text are not uncommon, but not all the speakers redeem themselves in the humor of their protest.

Following his experience in the Fifty-first Congress, it might have been thought Mr. Reed would never again be tolerated in the office of Speaker. Our good friend, Mr. Struble, at the time representing this district, may have thought so, for Mr. Struble was extremely anxious to forward the Sioux City building bill and was repeatedly disappointed, and finally gave way to speech of such inflammatory topknot that the Democratic side applauded. But Mr. Reed returned to the Speakership in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and at the close of it was complimented by the Democratic side, in conjunction with the Speaker's side, and this pleasant incident was repeated at the close of the Fifty-fifth Congress. The Democrats had gotten used to the Reed rules, and they had learned out of their own experience the necessity for them.

When the House itself is materially re-formed, the rules will be less stringent, but the prospect seems remote.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it may modestly be claimed that I have shown:

First. That the assaults made upon the Speaker and the Committee on Rules were without justification.

Second. That the rules of the House are wise and just and indispensable to an orderly and successful discharge of the duties incumbent upon us as members of a great legislative body.

Third. That the entire organization of the House has been and is made upon just appreciation of the rights of all the members; that greater power has been given members in their first and second terms than ever before in any prior organization.

Fourth. That the record shows that no discrimination against the gentleman from Washington or his State has been shown.

THE PHILIPPINES AND THE ASSAULTS UPON THE ARMY.

Mr. Chairman, during the very brief time that I have left I want to say a few words about these attacks upon the Army of the United States, which have been the stock in trade of the opponents of the pending bill during its progress through the Senate and over to the House of Representatives. I want to put on record a single statement of my opinion about how much force and effect ought to be given to the complaints made upon the other side in regard to the conduct of our army in the Philippines. I believe in the Army. I am a great admirer of the Army of the United States. I believe that the Regular Army of this country embodies in proportion to the numbers on their muster roll as much of personal honor, as much of patriotism, as much of dignity, as much of humanity as can be found in any equal number of men on the face of the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is my judgment of the Regular Army; but I have kept my eye upon the progress of events in all the wars about which I have read, and I believe that, taking all that has been said, admitting all that is claimed on the other side, which I do only for the purpose of argument, there has been no war of modern times where there was as little of retaliation, as little of the execution of the purposes of revenge, as little of that brutality which is always invoked in war between men, as in the Philippine Islands. I believe that when history is fairly and justly written it will be said of the army in the Philippines what has been said of the army under Chaffee in China, that the American soldier at Pekin, commanded by that gallant and distinguished representative, first of the volunteer forces and then of the Regular Army, set an example that was commented upon favorably by all the civilized world. I believe that when Pekin fell and when the rescue had been successful, that had the verdict of civilization been written the highest meed of praise would have been given to the portion of the Regular Army of the United States commanded by Chaffee. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Then there was no politics involved; then there was not any necessity for a political party to be paving the way to a coming campaign upon the hope, the feeble, faint hope, that they might be able to lodge a majority in Congress upon slander of the Army of the United States. I want it to be understood that I differentiate not in one hair between the condemnation of the officers of that Army and the soldiers. I believe that when the full history of those events has been shown and brought to the surface it will be shown that there has been more of moderation, more of suppression and the curbing of inhumanity than there has been of violation of duty or the violation of the principles of humanity. War brings these things, Mr. Chairman. I heard a gentleman on the other side say that we went through a long, deadly war. He said it was a war between the States. I said it was some other kind of a war. I will compromise with the gentleman and will say the civil war. He said that there was no act of inhumanity; that we were generous to each other, loving and kind; shooting at each other, but always binding up the wounds that we made; that Christianity was the prevailing sentiment of that war, and barbarity through the descendants of the men who fought that war on both sides, it is claimed, has been the prevailing sentiment of this war.

Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that taking the worst thing that has been said about General Smith, I can produce a counterpart more deadly and more inhuman, coming from both sides in the civil war. Take his plea of guilty that he told the men to make Samar a howling wilderness and to kill the combatants. And I stop here to point out that no man has shown yet that under that order any woman or child was ever killed. They have started out by saying that "Hell-Roaring Jake Smith," as they call him, ordered that everybody should be killed down to 10 years of age, and then they say a hundred thousand were killed; but it does not appear that Jake Smith's order killed a woman or child or anyone not guilty of treachery or other crime, and the witnesses who testify said that they never killed one. But let us see what our ancient comrades of the war of the rebellion used to say. There was over here a beautiful valley, the Shenandoah. It was a troublesome valley. The rebel army had an unpleasant way of slipping out of the Shenandoah Valley and striking the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Harpers Ferry and going almost everywhere after they had got there, and it became necessary, finally, to destroy the means of subsistence in that valley. I have a few brief words of that general who has been so often quoted on the floor of this House, who said, "Let us have peace," "Give them back their horses," "Extend the olive branch," etc. That was in time of peace when he said all those good things. Here is what he said in time of war. He said:

> I am perfecting arrangements to break up the railroad in front of Dalton, including the city of Atlanta, and push into Georgia, break up all its railroads and depots, capture its horses and negroes, and make desolation everywhere.

That is what Grant said. Then he said:

> If you can possibly spare a division of cavalry, send them through Loudoun County to destroy and carry off the crops, animals, and negroes, and all men under 50 as prisoners of war.

Not as citizen prisoners. Then, again:

> Do all the damage to railroads and crops you can, so as to prevent further planting. We want the Shenandoah Valley to remain a barren waste.

And before Phil Sheridan got through with it he had obeyed the orders of his chief. There are a number of other choice extracts. That was what the Yankees said. How pious were our friends on the other side? I read from a memorable book. I was told by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] that there was but one copy of it in the world, and he told me where it was likely to be found, and I found it in the Library of Congress. It is the Life and Letters of Stonewall Jackson, by his wife; New York: Harper & Bros., 1892.

Now, I take it that it is likely to be true. I presume it is, because the letters are here. Stonewall Jackson was the embodiment of the Christian soldier—lovable, it was said by his men, feared by his enemies, gallant, and brave; and there is only one question left in all the ex-Southern Confederacy to-day, and that is whether, if Jackson had only lived, they would not have had two countries here. He was the great embodiment of the chivalrous Southern soldier. Now, he got tired of the ordinary processes of war, and here is what he said. I read from a statement made by his brother-in-law, Col. L. S. Baker, a young West Pointer.

At that time the authorities at Washington had begun to change their war policy and Maj. Gen. John Pope had entered northern Virginia, and as he himself boasted, with "headquarters in the saddle." The author of this book, the wife of General Jackson, on page 307, says:

> But what disturbed the Southern people more than his martial prowess was the way in which he began his operations, which were said to be in violation of all the laws of war. This naturally provoked bitter resentment and led to threats of retaliation. That alone explains the following interview, in which Jackson speaks of raising the black flag—a suggestion so alien to his character that the statement would be received with the greatest reserve did it not come from his own brother-in-law, Capt. (afterwards General) Rufus Barringer, who might be supposed to be in his confidence. Even then it is justified only as a retaliation for the similar conduct of Pope. But as the latter's campaign soon came to an inglorious end, nothing more is ever heard of the retaliation. With this explanation I give the following letter, as furnishing a glimpse of the secret councils of the war, which will have its interest for the students of history:
> "During the battles around Richmond in June and July, 1862, I was a captain of cavalry in the First North Carolina Regiment, Col. L. S. Baker, a young West Pointer, commanding. Brig. Gen. J. E. B. Stuart had charge of all the cavalry in the Army, and for some days after the battles General Jackson still held the front, facing McClellan at Harrisons Landing.
> "On the 14th of July I was in picket along the Chickahominy and the James with my squadron, Companies C and F, the Mecklenburg and Cabarras companies. On that day Colonel Baker sent me a note, received from Stuart, as follows:
> "HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY BRIGADE, July 6, 1862.
> "COLONEL: General Jackson is anxious to see Capt. Rufus Barringer. Please send him up this afternoon, as Gen. J. may be gone after that. Please forward a report of operations of your cavalry from 26th June to 10th July as soon as possible.
>
> "In haste,
> "J. E. B. STUART,
> "Brigadier-General."
> "This note is now before me in Stuart's own writing, and, not coming through the ordinary staff channels, plainly showed it was the result of a personal interview between Stuart and Jackson. As General Jackson and I, however, were brothers-in-law, I attached no importance at the time to these incidental matters. It is proper, though, to add that in point of fact we had seen very little of each other prior to this time. He living in Virginia and I in North Carolina, and our occupations quite differing, we had only met a few times, and not at all since the war began. But he was now, when I reached his camp, unusually cordial, and at once remarked, 'Captain, I have sent for you for a matter entirely between ourselves. You will stay with me in my tent here to-night. If General Pope does not disturb us, I am sure McClellan will not, and we can have a good talk.' At that time the authorities at Washington had already begun to change their war policy, and Maj. Gen. John Pope had entered northern Virginia, and, as he himself boasted, 'with headquarters in the saddle,' threatened to overrun the whole country and speedily lay it waste.
> "With a soldier's plain supper, and lying together on army couches, and with this new movement of the enemy emphasizing his whole tone, General Jackson soon began the business in hand. Once fairly at ease, he said:
> "'I recall, Captain Barringer, the talk you and I once had at my table in Lexington in the heated party struggle of 1860. Though differing in politics, we happened to agree as to the character of this war, if it once began. We both thought it would be internecine in its results. Neither of us had any special concern for slavery, but both agreed that if the sword was once drawn the South would have no alternative but to defend her homes and firesides, slavery and all. I, myself, see in this war, if the North triumph, a dissolution of the bonds of all society. It is not alone the destruction of our property (which both the nation and the States are bound to protect), but it is the prelude to anarchy, infidelity, and the ultimate loss of free responsible government on this continent. With these convictions I always thought we ought to meet the Federal invaders on the outer verge of just right and defense, and raise at once the black flag, viz, "No quarter to the violators of our homes and firesides." It would in the end have proved true humanity and mercy. The Bible is full of such wars, and it is the only policy that would bring the North to its senses.'
> "This new phase of the struggle is full upon us, and General Lee is in great perplexity how to meet it. I have just had a conference with him on this vital point. No plan of campaign has as yet been agreed on. But I gave him frankly certain outlines of my own plan of waging the contest, which he considered favorably, and which he promised to lay before Mr. Davis, and try to secure his approval, in whole or in part. In which event, Captain, I expect to need your services here, and I shall have to order you up."
> General Jackson then told me in confidence, as a Confederate officer, that he was already under marching orders to move against Pope in Culpeper. "But," he said further, "General Lee is now considering certain special features of my war policy as applicable to the present emergency, and as the only way to check Pope's dastardly system of warfare and plunder. Unfortunately, the Confederate authorities are fully committed to a different policy—in fact, to a very stilted style of waging war. In every aspect the situation is embarrassing. McClellan is nominally in command, and his mode of warfare is in strict conformity to the usages of civilized nations."
> "As to a general policy, I think it unwise to attempt to defend the whole of our extended lines, especially our extended coast and water line. The enemy largely exceed us in men and material of war, especially in naval appliances, and our limited supply of both troops and munitions of war would ultimately be exhausted in a prolonged, gigantic struggle. To offset their palpable advantage in this respect I would seek to utilize the special points in which the South clearly leads the North, and I would risk the whole issue on the development of these special characteristics and the war policy based thereon. As I always said, my own first policy would have been the black flag to all comers against the safety of our Southern homes. Next to that, I would give up, as circumstances might seem to require, many exposed points and all untenable positions and gradually concentrate our choicest fighting men and most valuable material at a few strong interior camps, thoroughly fortified and so located as best at one and the same time to protect our communications, defend our people and territory against invasions of the enemy, and also keep up ceaseless aggressions upon them. These counter invasions would be the main feature of my policy.
> "I would organize our whole available fighting force so selected and located into two, four, or more light movable columns, specially armed and trained and equipped for sudden moves and for long and rapid marches. These light movable columns I would hurl against the enemy as they entered our borders, but only when sure of victory and when the loss of an army was impossible. But, better, I would hurl these thunderbolts of war against the rich cities and teeming regions of our Federal friends. I would seek to avoid all regular battles. I would subsist my troops as far as possible on the Northern people. I would lay heavy contributions in money on their cities. I would encumber my marches with no prisoners except noted leaders, held mainly as hostages for ransom or for retaliation. All the rank and file I would parole, but only at risk of life if the parole was violated. All this just as Pope is doing in Northern Virginia. I would train and practice the troops with special reference to the tactics of attack and retreat. But before turning my back to the foe or the enemy's country I would see that some other one or more of these 'movable columns' was on the march and striking at some other vital point, possibly hundreds of miles away. And so I would make it hot for our friends at their homes and firesides all the way to Kansas, 'bleeding Kansas,' and doubly so for Ohio and Pennsylvania."

Mr. Chairman, I can not go further, but in response to the statement of General Jackson the Confederate congress received the following telegram, as appears by the official records of the Confederate States:

CHARLESTON, S. C., October 13, 1862.

Hon. W. PORCHER MILES,
Member of Congress, Richmond, Va.:

Has bill for execution of abolition prisoners after 1st of January next passed? Do it and England will be stirred into action. It is high time to proclaim the black flag for that period. Let the execution be with the garrote.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

(Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, Series II, Vol. IV, p. 916.)

The "bill" to which General Beauregard referred in the above-quoted communication appears to have been "joint resolutions," introduced in the Confederate house of representatives October 1, 1862. A copy of the original, on file in the War Department, follows:

"Whereas it is manifest that despairing of the subjugation of the Confederate States or any of them, the Congress and President of the United States have deliberately set about the work of inciting the slave population of these States to insurrection by declaring them emancipated from and after the 1st day of January, 1863, which action on the part of the said Congress and President is in direct violation of the Constitution which they were sworn to support, in contravention of all law, human and divine, and has been resorted to for the diabolical purpose of involving the slaves and their owners, embracing innocent women and children, in one common ruin, and for the further purpose of maintaining themselves in power by catering to the fanatical spirit of abolitionism; and

"Whereas each of the States of this Confederacy have enacted laws punishing with death all persons engaged in inciting the slave population to insurrection or rebellion, and there is much stronger reason for inflicting this penalty upon persons who not only voluntarily conspire to perpetrate this horrible felony, but in addition thereto come to devastate our land, burn our dwellings, waste our substance, and murder our citizens: Therefore,

"The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact that so long as the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln, the President of the United States, dated the 22d day of September, 1862, proposing to emancipate the slaves of this Confederacy from and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1863, shall remain unrevoked, all commissioned officers of the United States Army who shall be seized, captured, taken, or arrested within the limits of this Confederacy after the said 1st day of January, 1863, shall be deemed and held voluntarily to have entered the Confederate States for the purpose of maintaining said proclamation and of bringing about the result thereby contemplated of a servile insurrection, and the said officers shall in no wise be regarded or treated as prisoners of war, but as felons, and it shall be the duty of the President to cause to be constituted a sufficient number of courts-martial to try said offenders and, if condemned, to see that they are promptly executed by being hanged by the neck until they are dead.

"SEC. 2. Congress do further enact that should the aforesaid proclamation of Abraham Lincoln continue unrevoked on the 1st day of January, 1863, it shall be the duty of the President of these Confederate States to make proclamation that this act will be strictly enforced."

DE JARNETT, From Foreign Affairs.

I confess that the measure did not pass in its original enormity, but it did pass in the form of a most bitter retaliatory measure, as follows:

It appears from the journal of the Confederate House of Representatives for October 11, 1862, that the foregoing resolutions were taken up and, after the introduction of amendments thereto, finally passed, as follows:

"Whereas the Northern States, now represented by the Federal Government of the late Union, commenced the present war of invasion to enforce an unfounded and tyrannical claim of dominion over sovereign States which had withdrawn from the Union; and, pretending that these States are in rebellion, have sought to deny to them from the beginning of the war the rights accorded to belligerents by the usages of nations; and, after prosecuting this war without success more than a year since this Government was recognized by European nations as a belligerent power, have continued, under the same pretext, to inflict upon the good people of these States inhuman injuries, in contemptuous disregard of the usages of civilized warfare, exacting from them treasonable oaths and service, and upon refusal subjecting unarmed citizens, women and children, to banishment, imprisonment, and death; wantonly burning their dwelling houses, ravaging the land, murdering men for pretended or trivial offenses, making rapine of private property a systematic object of the war, organizing the abduction of slaves by armies and agents of Government, endeavoring to foment servile insurrection by tampering with slaves, by proclaiming schemes for emancipating them, by passing laws to equalize the races, by protecting slaves in resisting their masters, and by preparing armed bands of negroes to fight in the presence of negro slaves for the subjugation of the white race; permitting outrages on women to be committed by a licentious soldiery, encouraged in a memorable instance by the order of a major-general and the acquiescence of his Government; attempting, until restrained by a threat of retaliation, to murder privateersmen for engaging in a mode of warfare expressly sanctioned by the Constitution of the United States and the Confederate States and by the laws of nations; refusing, with double inhumanity, to exchange prisoners until constrained by the long duration and adverse fortune of the war; attempting to ruin our cities by filling up the entrances of their harbors with stone and diverting the ancient channels of great rivers; cutting off our supplies of medicines, needed as well for suffering women, children, and captive enemies as for the sick of our armies, and perpetrating other atrocities which would be disgraceful to savages; and

"Whereas the said Government of the United States, in the same spirit of barbarous ferocity, has recently enacted a law entitled 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' and has announced by a proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln, the President thereof, that in pursuance of said law, on the 1st day of January, 1863, 'all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall be in rebellion against the United States, shall be thenceforward and forever free,' and has thereby made manifest that the vast war of invasion which it wages with such lawless cruelty is conducted with a view, by judicial murders, banishments, and otherwise, to exterminate the loyal population of these States, to transfer their property to their enemies, to emancipate their slaves, to destroy their labor system, to subvert the institutions, human and divine, upon which it is founded, employing slaves and other negroes for these purposes, with an atrocious design of adding servile insurrection and the massacre of families to the calamities of war; and

"Whereas since the passage of said act executive and military orders have evinced a determined purpose of the enemy to carry out this policy of rapine and extermination with brutal and surprising severity; and

"Whereas justice and humanity require the government of the Confederate States to endeavor to punish and repress the atrocious practices and designs of the enemy by inflicting severe retribution: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States, That the president will be sustained in resorting to such measures of retaliation as in his judgment may be demanded by the above-recited lawless and barbarous conduct and designs of the enemy."

The journal of the Confederate senate for October 13, 1862, shows the receipt of a message from the house of representatives, in words as follows:

"Mr. President, the house of representatives have passed a joint resolution (H. R. ——) in regard to retaliation, in which they request the concurrence of the senate.

"And, on motion by Mr. Clay,

"Ordered, That the joint resolution (H. R. 21) in regard to retaliation be transferred to the secret legislative calendar."

The journal of the senate in secret session October 13, 1862, shows that the resolution was unanimously adopted without amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have shown both sides, but not for the purpose of rekindling the embers of the war.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not true that before that act was introduced or offered, that there had been a proclamation issued by the President of the United States directing that certain citizens in the valley of Virginia and elsewhere should be seized and tried by court-martial and these men were then imprisoned; and is it not true that upon that act being passed——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know whether that is true or not: it may be that the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the history of the country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no such history; but assuming for the purposes of my argument that it is so, then the stronger is my position, and yet that is no reason why any man to-day ought to be fast to criticise a soldier in the army in the Philippines because he is not willing to have his comrades sneaked up to and murdered by a cowardly enemy over there. I stand by the Army. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GIBSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 7, 1902:

H. R. 11124. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Scott; and

H. R. 11288. An act granting an increase of pension to William E. Ball.

On June 17, 1902:

H. R. 13296. An act granting an increase of pension to Francis Scott.

On June 19, 1902:

H. R. 9334. An act to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes.

On June 20, 1902:

H. R. 12865. An act regulating the use of telephone wires in the District of Columbia.

On June 21, 1902:

H. R. 12420. An act granting a pension to Wesley Brummett;

H. R. 4103. An act granting a pension to William C. Hickox;

H. R. 12828. An act granting a pension to Mary E. Culver;

H. R. 11052. An act granting a pension to Nelson Johnson;

H. R. 14411. An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners;

H. R. 7679. An act granting an increase of pension to Franklin Snyder;

H. R. 8794. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith;

H. R. 10545. An act granting an increase of pension to Solomon P. Brockway; and

H. R. 13278. An act granting an increase of pension to Levi H. Collins.

On June 23, 1902:

H. R. 6847. An act to correct the record of Michael Hayes.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, with a measure of such far-reaching importance before the committee, I was very sorry indeed that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who of all Republicans has the authority to disclose the hidden policy of the Administration on this question, should consume almost his entire hour, not in discussing this bill, but in defending himself and his colleagues on the Committee on Rules against the charges made by one of his Republican colleagues from the State of Washington, that this House was no longer a deliberative body, but, under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, had passed into an oligarchy. This is the third answer made to the charges of the gentleman from Washington by those in the oligarchy, and no one knows how many more answers are in waiting. I suppose it is about time that the gentleman from Washington should have another inning. It may be easier for these gentlemen to amend their rules than to make a satisfactory answer to the charges of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. Chairman, in discussing the bill under consideration and the subject to which it refers, I shall assume that neither the American Congress nor the American people have yet determined the future status of the Philippine Islands. I know it is frequently asserted by those who take only a superficial view of this subject that the ratification of the Paris treaty settled this question. But those Senators who voted for the ratification of that treaty did not so understand it, as shown by their repeated declarations upon the subject while the treaty was still pending in the Senate.

Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, on the — day of January, 1899, declared:

Suppose we ratify the treaty. The islands pass from the possession of Spain into our possession without committing us to any policy. I believe we shall have the wisdom not to attempt to incorporate those islands with our body politic or make their inhabitants a part of our citizenship.

And Senator SPOONER, of Wisconsin, one of the ablest Republicans in the Senate, and one who did more, perhaps, than any other Senator to secure the ratification of the treaty, on the 2d day of February, 1899, spoke as follows:

But, Mr. President, I shrink from the notion that the interests of this country will be subserved by making permanently a part of our land territory thousands of miles away, inhabited by peoples alien to us, not of our blood, not of our way of thinking, foreign to all our associations, living in a tropical climate, where the white man can not work, under labor conditions of necessity which we would not permit to exist in the United States.

Every argument which has been made in support of this doctrine of territorial expansion—and by "territorial expansion" I mean permanent territorial expansion—seems to me to be superficial, some of them sentimental, and some of them fantastic.

The jingle of words which we read every day about "hauling down the flag" does not in the least either thrill me or impress me. Our flag has been hauled down before, Mr. President. It will be hauled down again.

* * * * * * *

To-day it floats in Cuba; the Spanish flag has gone forever, but our flag is not there to stay. It floats there in sight of the poor, wrecked Maine at Habana, but there will come a day, Mr. President—and I hope it will not be long—when we will take down our flag, raised there in the cause of liberty, and leave behind it liberty and an independent government, won and established under its folds. I hope that, too, about the Philippines, and that is not at all inconsistent in my view with the ratification of the pending treaty.

It is insisted that we must have permanent territorial expansion in order to extend our trade. Mr. President, I do not think so. I have been strongly inclined to think that in the long run, with all the embarrassments and complications and dangers it will bring upon our people, it will retard rather than develop the foreign trade of the United States. We have been growing rapidly in our trade without territorial expansion. To acquire distant, nonassimilable peoples in order, through permanent dominion, to force our trade upon them, seems to me to be the poorest imaginable national policy. How far will that be carried? We want the trade of the world, and we intend to have our share of it. Are we, therefore, to obtain it by carrying this doctrine of expansion to the uttermost parts of the earth? If territorial expansion means national trade, if it be necessary to national trade, where are we to stop?

Permanent dominion over the Philippines by the United States as a part of this country means to me an endless and vast burden upon the industries our people.

Those who will take the trouble to read the very able speech of this distinguished Republican Senator from Wisconsin will find it an unanswerable argument against the permanent retention of the Philippines by the United States. Sir, such clear and definite statements by such able Republican Senators show beyond question that they did not suppose for a moment that the ratification of the treaty determined the status of the islands. They all understood that the treaty itself provided that Congress and not the Senate should determine the status of the Filipino people, and as Congress has never exercised this power it is still its duty to determine whether the Filipinos shall be citizens of the United States or citizens of their own free and independent country. As I said on a former occasion, I think the Senate made a very serious mistake in the ratification of the Paris treaty; but Senators did not realize that American greed would be harder to deal with than Spain in giving independence to the Philippines. I know it is repeatedly declared that the people have already settled this question. Why, sir, this issue has never been fairly presented to the people for their judgment.

The Republican leaders up to this time have not had the courage or the candor to declare any definite policy on this question, but have preferred to lead the American people and the Filipino people step by step in darkness and uncertainty, careful to conceal their final purposes until they had passed beyond the point of retreat. It can not be contended that the last President was elected on this issue, because he was supported by such distinguished citizens as ex-President Harrison, of Indiana; Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, and thousands of others who were bitterly opposed to the policy of the Administration in the Philippines. So, Mr. Chairman, I think it is still in order to submit to this House and to the country some evidence and some reasons which may help to bring the Congress and the people to a just settlement of this question. Going back to the beginning, we find that when the United States declared war against Spain for the liberation of Cuba, the Filipinos were then engaged in a revolution against the same country. In this connection let me read from Oscar Williams, our consul at Manila, to the Washington Government, February 23, 1898:

Peace was proclaimed, and since my coming festivities therefor were held; but there is no peace and there has been none for about two years. Conditions here and in Cuba are practically alike. War exists, battles are almost of daily occurrence, ambulances bring in many wounded, and hospitals are full. Prisoners are brought here and shot without trial, and Manila is under martial law.

The Crown forces have not been able to dislodge a rebel army within 10 miles of Manila, and last Saturday, February 19, a battle was there fought and five dead left on the field. Much of such information is found in my longer dispatch referred to, and which is at your command.

A republic is organized here, as in Cuba. Insurgents are being armed and drilled and are rapidly increasing in numbers and efficiency, and all agree that a general uprising will come as soon as the governor-general embarks for Spain, which is fixed for March. (Senate Document 62, p. 319, 56th Cong.)

When Admiral Dewey attacked and destroyed the Spanish fleet at Manila the American forces at once received the hearty and constant cooperation of the Filipino people. Our leaders sought their leaders, invited their assistance, and received it. Mr. Pratt, the American consul at Singapore, writing to the Secretary of State, April 28, 1898, said:

No. 212. CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Singapore, April 28, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to report that I sent you on the 27th instant, and confirmed in my dispatch No. 211 of that date, a telegram, which deciphered read as follows:

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

General Aguinaldo gone my instance Hongkong arrange with Dewey cooperation insurgents Manila.

PRATT.

The facts are these: On the evening of Saturday, the 23d instant, I was confidentially informed of the arrival here, incognito, of the supreme leader of the Philippine insurgents, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, by Mr. H. W. Bray, an English gentleman of high standing, who, after fifteen years' residence as a merchant and planter in the Philippines, has been compelled by the disturbed condition of things resulting from Spanish misrule to abandon his property and leave there, and from whom I had previously obtained much valuable information for Commodore Dewey regarding fortifications, coal deposits, etc., at different points in the islands.

Being aware of the great prestige of General Aguinaldo with the insurgents, and that no one, either at home or abroad, could exert over them the same influence and control that he could, I determined at once to see him, and, at my request, a secret interview was accordingly arranged for the following morning, Sunday, the 24th, in which, besides General Aguinaldo, were only present the General's trusted advisers and Mr. Bray, who acted as interpreter.

At this interview, after learning from General Aguinaldo the state of and object sought to be obtained by the present insurrectionary movement, which, though absent from the Philippines, he was still directing, I took it upon myself, while explaining that I had no authority to speak for the Government, to point out the danger of continuing independent action at this stage; and having convinced him of the expediency of cooperating with our fleet, then at Hongkong, and obtaining the assurance of his willingness to proceed thither and confer with Commodore Dewey to that end, should the latter so desire. I telegraphed the commodore the same day as follows, through our consul-general at Hongkong:

"Aguinaldo, insurgent leader, here. Will come Hongkong arrange with commodore for general cooperation insurgents Manila if desired. Telegraph.

"PRATT."

The commodore's reply read thus:

Tell Aguinaldo come soon as possible.

DEWEY.

I received it late that night, and at once communicated to General Aguinaldo, who, with his aid-de-camp and private secretary, all under assumed names, I succeeded in getting off by the British steamer Malacca, which left here on Tuesday, the 26th.

Just previous to his departure I had a second and last interview with General Aguinaldo, the particulars of which I shall give you by next mail.

The General impressed me as a man of intelligence, ability, and courage, and worthy the confidence that had been placed in him.

I think that in arranging for his direct cooperation with the commander of our forces I have prevented possible conflict of action and facilitated the work of occupying and administering the Philippines. (Senate Document No. 62, p. 341, Fifty-sixth Congress.)

This shows how our own officers invited Aguinaldo and his followers to cooperate with us in that war.

Here is a plain invitation from Admiral Dewey to Aguinaldo to join him in the war against Spain, and no explanation can ever change the plain meaning of this message or weaken its force.

Just as soon as arrangements could be completed between Pratt, Dewey, and Aguinaldo, the latter was taken to the Philippines under American authority, and upon his arrival he issued a proclamation which contained the following:

Filipinos, the great nation, North America, cradle of true liberty, and friendly on that account to the liberty of our people, oppressed and subjugated by the tyranny and despotism of those who have governed us, has come to manifest even here a protection which is decisive as well as disinterested toward us, considering us endowed with sufficient civilization to govern by ourselves this our unhappy land.

Sir, these sublime sentiments inspired the dusky followers of Aguinaldo to rally around the American flag by the thousands to do battle for the independence of their own country. If it were not the desire for liberty that induced them to leave their families and their homes to enter upon the bloody mission of war, then, sir, what could have been the motive which induced them to offer their services and their lives in the cause of a foreign power? It was not for money, for we did not hire them. It was for no other reward than the freedom and independence of their own country. Remember, there was not an American soldier in those islands when Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet on May 1, 1898, and none till July following. During all this time and long before all the fighting on land was done by the Filipinos.

That you may have some idea of the valuable services which they rendered in that campaign, let me read from our consul at Manila to the Washington Government:

Sir: I have the honor to report that since our squadron destroyed the Spanish fleet on May 1 the insurgent forces have been most active and almost uniformly successful in their many encounters with the Crown forces of Spain. Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, the insurgent chief, who was deported late in 1897, returned recently to Cavite and resumed direction of insurgent forces. He is not permitted by his people to personally lead in battle, but from headquarters governs all military movements. He told me to-day that since his return his forces had captured nearly 5,000 prisoners, nearly 4,000 of whom were Spaniards, and all of whom had rifles when taken. General Aguinaldo has now about 10,500 rifles and 8 field pieces, with 8,000 more rifles, 2 Maxim guns, and a dynamite gun bought in China and now in transit. The insurgents have defeated the Spaniards at all points except at fort near Malate, and hold not only North Luzon to the suburbs of Manila, but Batangas Province also, and the bay coast entire save the city of Manila. * * * We fear the city may fall too soon.

This evidence shows that the Filipinos had driven the army of Spain into Manila, had captured several thousand Spanish prisoners, and practically ended the war on the islands before the American soldiers arrived.

When our Army first reached the Philippines they were received with open arms and friendly greetings. The Filipinos had already learned that the Americans were friends of liberty, and they regarded them as their coming liberators. And why not? Listen to the first words of the first American general to land on the islands, General Anderson.

July 4, 1898, Brigadier-General Anderson to Aguinaldo, page 390, Senate Document No. 62:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
Cavite Arsenal, P. I., July 4, 1898.

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding Philippine Forces, Cavite, Luzon.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inform you that the United States of America, whose land forces I have the honor to command in this vicinity, being at war with the Kingdom of Spain, has entire sympathy and most friendly sentiments for the native people of the Philippine Islands.

For these reasons I desire to have the most amicable relations with you, and to have you and your people cooperate with us in military operations against the Spanish forces.

Also on page 394, same document:

General Anderson to Aguinaldo.

GENERAL: When I came here three weeks ago I requested your excellency to give what assistance you could to procure means of transportation for the American army, as it was to fight in the cause of your people.

Also Major Jones to Aguinaldo, on same page, same document:

We are here to befriend the Filipinos.

And so our first general to reach these islands invited Aguinaldo and his followers to cooperate with the American forces, and declared that our army was there to fight in the cause of their people.

Sir, it is mere idle words to be quibbling whether this was an alliance or not. It is enough for honorable people to know that we invited the Filipinos to cooperate with us and they did so; we sought their assistance and received it.

That they rendered us very valuable services in that engagement no American can deny. Their brave patriots who fell before the Spanish guns saved to the American nation millions of money and thousands of lives. For if the Filipinos instead of cooperating with us had united against us or even remained neutral it would have made it necessary for us to send to those islands several thousand more soldiers and continued the war much longer than we did.

So it matters not whether in so many words we promised those people their independence or not, we were under a great moral obligation to recognize their independence after they had proven themselves such brave and loyal friends at a time when their services were so useful to our cause.

They had rendered us much more service than the Cubans and deserved just as much of our gratitude. No American ever has and no American ever can give one good reason why we should give freedom to the Cubans and not to the Filipinos. There is no ground for such unjust discrimination. The evidence before the Paris Commission was that the Filipinos were better fitted for self-government than the Cubans. Admiral Dewey, in a dispatch from the Philippines on June 23, 1898, said: "These people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the Cubans, and I am familiar with both races." There was much proof before the Commission that the Filipinos had already begun to establish in a very intelligent manner a representative government; that they were very enthusiastic for independence and would resist to the bitter end any attempt to establish American sovereignty over the islands. One Major Bell testified as follows:

There is not a particle of doubt but what Aguinaldo and his leaders will resist any attempt of any government to reorganize colonial government here. They are especially bitter toward the Spaniards, but equally determined not to submit any longer to being a colony of any other government. * * * Aguinaldo—honest, sincere, and poor, not well educated, but a natural leader of men, with considerable shrewdness and ability, has the power of creating among the people confidence in himself, and is undoubtedly a very popular man, highly respected by all. (Senate Doc. No. 62, p. 380.)

And Mr. Vanderlip, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, on page 570, same document, stated:

There can be no thought of assimilation. It can not be expected that the people of these islands will ever be brought to a comprehension of our institutions. We need not even hope for sympathetic submission.

So, Mr. Chairman, we were fully forewarned by our own witnesses that if we undertook the forcible annexation of those islands we might expect war, long-continued war, with their people.

Notwithstanding their hearty cooperation with us in the war just ended and all the flattering promises with which our officers and generals had encouraged such cooperation, the American authorities turned a deaf ear to all their appeals for liberty, to all their prayers for freedom, and did not even permit them to be heard in the trial of their own cause.

And yet it would have been just as easy to force Spain to relinquish her sovereignty over the Philippines as to cede it to the United States. It would have been just as easy to compel Spain to free the Filipinos as the Cubans. Spain was already whipped, whipped by the Americans and Filipinos, and lay powerless at our feet ready to surrender upon almost any terms rather than resume a war which surely would have ended in her complete destruction.

We have some reason to believe that in the beginning of the deliberations neither our commissioners nor the President favored the forcible annexation of those islands. But mighty influences were in operation which could not be resisted. American greed already had its exploiters in the islands investigating their lands, their timbers, and their minerals, and they were the first to decree the forcible annexation of the islands. It is true the Administration also was doing a little investigating about that time, and in this connection the following from the testimony of Commodore Bradford before the Commission is rather interesting, on page 472, Senate Document No. 62, Fifty-sixth Congress:

Q. Will you please state your name, residence, and position in the United States Navy?

A. R. B. Bradford, commander, United States Navy, Chief Bureau Equipment, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

Q. How long have you been in the naval service of the United States?

A. Since 1861.

Q. When were you at Manila?

A. I was there first in 1867, again in 1868, and again 1869; not since.

Q. Have you had any occasion recently to investigate the situation on these islands?

A. During the past two months I have made a study of the islands and their value as colonies of the United States.

* * * We have driven the Spanish Government out of the Philippines; there is no Spanish authority there now, or practically none.

* * * Of course I am interested, primarily, from a military point of view, on account of my profession.

* * * It seems to me that they are parceling out the coast of China, and we should be in it or as near it as possible.

Why had this American officer been engaged for two months studying the value of these islands as colonies of the United States unless for the purpose of enabling the Administration to determine whether it would pay to make colonies of them? It seems that the Administration was not depending entirely upon the suggestions of the Almighty as to the proper course to pursue. But at the very time our commissioners were in session an investigation by the Administration was going on to determine the value of those islands as colonies of the United States. We were not studying the people to ascertain if they were capable of self-government or fit to become citizens of the United States, but studying the valuables of the islands to see if there would be any money in their forcible acquisition.

Sir, in the face of all such evidence, how ridiculous it is to talk about those islands coming to us as the fate of war or the act of Providence. Their annexation was as deliberately planned as any wrong ever committed. How strange, indeed, that a just God should lead us out of Cuba with one hand in order to make her people free, and with the other lead us into the Philippine Islands to subjugate the people there.

The resolution which Congress had passed disclaiming any intention to annex Cuba applied with equal force to the Philippine Islands.

If we had treated the Filipinos as we treated the Cubans, we would have escaped all this horrible war. We would have saved to the American people the $600,000,000 wasted in this bloody enterprise. We would have saved several thousand brave American soldiers whose lives have been lost in trying to maintain this foolish, un-American policy in the Philippines. If we had refused to recognize the independence of Cuba and undertaken to establish our sovereignty in that island, we would have had the same bitter experience in Cuba we have had in the Philippines. If we had recognized the independence of the Filipinos as we did the Cubans, we would now have the same peace and good will in the Philippines as in Cuba. What American citizen does not feel proud when he reflects upon that beautiful scene in Cuba a few days ago, when the flag of the American Republic was lowered amid the joys and welcomes of the Cuban people where they had assembled to pay their last farewell to its protecting folds and to raise in its place the proud emblem of their own free Republic?

Where is the political phrasemaker who has so often declared that where the American flag goes up it shall never come down? Where is the American citizen who would haul down the flag of the Cuban Republic and raise in its place the flag of the American Republic to be maintained by the American Army? Where is the American citizen who does not wish in his soul that the American Government at the close of the Spanish war had recognized the independence of the Filipinos so they, too, might now be enjoying their own free republic? Who, sir, is so mercenary as not to prefer a peaceful picture like this to the painful scenes now going on in the Philippines? But it has been charged that the Filipinos commenced hostilities before the treaty was acted upon.

And Buencamino, a Filipino twice a traitor to his own people and once a traitor to Spain, now receiving a salary of $3,500 under the American Government in the Philippines, was brought to the United States to prove the Filipinos commenced hostilities, but admitted on cross-examination it was not true. Mr. Chairman, the evidence of American officers on this question very clearly shows that in the conflict between the Americans and Filipinos the first gun was fired by an American and the first man killed was a Filipino. And the evidence further shows that the Filipino generals were not expecting the outbreak, were absent at the time it occurred, and at once endeavored to arrange with the American generals to end hostilities. But the American generals refused, declaring that war, having been commenced, must continue to the grim end. However, it is of but very little consequence who fired the first shot, because the Administration had already instructed the American Army to proceed at once to take possession of the islands by force if necessary long before the treaty was ratified and without any authority for such military occupation. It was virtually a declaration of war by the President against the Filipinos, and they so considered it. They were invited to surrender their liberties and turn over their country to American authority long before the treaty went into effect.

A people who will not fight for liberty are unworthy of liberty. If we had only intimated to the Filipinos that it was our intention to recognize their independence at some future time after a stable government had been established, there never would have been a gun fired or a man killed. But instead of giving them any such encouragement the Senate at the time it ratified the treaty even voted down a resolution favoring the final independence of the islands. Sir, it has often been asserted by gentlemen on the other side that the Democrats forced the Administration into the war against Spain. The war against Spain was for the liberation of Cuba. It was not a war for conquest, but a war for humanity. The war against the Filipinos is a war for conquest and not for humanity. The war against Spain was declared by Congress; the war against the Filipinos was declared by the President. The war against the Filipinos is quite a different war from the one against Spain, notwithstanding some gentlemen try to make them appear as one war in order to confuse and deceive the people.

The Administration was not forced into this war against the Philippine Islands. It went into it of its own free choice. At the close of the Spanish war the Administration had the opportunity to choose peace and the independence of the Philippines or war and their forcible annexation, and it deliberately chose war, and we have had it with all its horrors ever since. Sir, the Democrats have tried to end this war in the Philippines, and if they had the power they would end it now. They would say to those people: "If you will lay down your arms and establish a stable government, we will follow our glorious example in Cuba and recognize your independence." This, sir, would be no surrender or retreat on our part, but would be a very honorable termination of a very dishonorable war.

Who can read the inhuman cruelties in the Philippines and desire the war to continue one day longer?

The evidence before the Senate committee shows that innocent and peaceable citizens have been forcibly taken from their homes, stripped of their clothing, thrown upon their backs, their mouths forced open with sticks, their stomachs pumped full of water until their bodies were greatly swollen, their eyes bloodshot, their whole body scringing in pain, not as retaliation, but for the purpose of extorting information which they were supposed to have.

The evidence shows that in many instances wounded and defenseless prisoners have been tortured and killed. The evidence shows that in many engagements the Filipinos killed outnumbered the American losses over 20 to 1; that while the Americans wounded were always much greater than the Americans killed, yet the Filipinos killed were always many times more than the Filipinos wounded, showing it has been almost a war of extermination. General Hughes testified the Filipinos were almost as helpless in battle as women.

The evidence shows that thousands of peaceful homes have been burned from over the heads of innocent and helpless women and children. I now recall the testimony of one American officer who stated that he had been in charge of a certain town of 10,000 people for several months where there was no insurrection, where all was quiet and peace, until one morning, when a certain Captain Glen, of the Regular Army, made his appearance in the town with a small force, commenced the torture of the water cure, and ordered the whole town burned. The torch was quickly applied, and that town of 10,000 people was burned into ashes, except about 15 buildings; that another peaceful town of about 12,000 near by was burned about the same time in the same manner.

The evidence shows that one General Smith gave orders to kill all over 10 years, whether armed or unarmed, including innocent and helpless women and children. When this cruel order first came out no Republican attempted to defend it, but I heard Republican Senators condemn it and express the hope it was not true. But when it was discovered that the fact could not be disputed they began to work themselves up to a point where they could defend it. The venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GROW, grew very earnest in trying to defend this inhuman order before the House. He declared a boy of 10 was very dangerous with a gun in his hand. It occurred to me that if a little Filipino lad of 10 could have been at the side of the stately Pennsylvanian it would have illustrated very forcibly the nonsense of the proposition which his zeal was attempting to defend.

The evidence shows that in a single province of 300,000 people 100,000 have died since this war began; not all killed, but many of them died from starvation, others of disease because they were so weak for want of food they were not able to resist the ravages of disease, but most all due directly or indirectly to the war and its policy. Do you tell me, sir, that such inhuman treatment as this will establish in the hearts of those people a love and respect for American institutions? Will it not produce in the Filipinos an everlasting hate for the American people and American Government?

Mr. Chairman, let me say in language which can not be misunderstood that I do not hold the American soldiers responsible for these cruel outrages in the Philippines, except an occasional officer. The American soldiers in those islands have had their full share of hardships, disease, and death as a part of the high price we are paying for that unhappy country. And I have no doubt but the American soldier in the Philippines has been as humane and merciful as any other soldier could have been under such conditions. I have had some soldiers who have returned from those islands tell me that while they had had the opportunity to witness some of these tortures, they had not the heart to do so, and some of them have been so outraged in their feelings that they have ventured to report some of the tortures for investigation. So I repeat that as a rule our soldiers there have been as humane and sympathetic as any you will find, and some of the hardest things said about these brave soldiers have been said by some of their own military officers, and the records will show it.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, the responsibility for these barbarous cruelties in the Philippines does not rest upon the soldiers, but upon men right here in Washington—men who are advocating and directing this mercenary policy of torture, bloodshed, and destruction in the Philippine Islands. You can not maintain such a policy of force by any other kind of warfare, and these horrors will continue not for one year or two years, but so long as we attempt to fasten our yoke upon those people. While we may think our yoke is easy and our burden is light, those who are compelled to bear them may not think so. Why is it, sir, that the President and his followers have made such a uniform effort to make it appear the Army has been assailed? Because it is easier to defend the Army than the policy of the Administration, and that is their common motive.

Sir, the only peace we can ever hope to obtain by such methods as these is the peace of the grave. I know we have the power to destroy the Filipinos and take their country by force. We have the money and the men to kill all over 10 and under 10, burn their peaceful homes to ashes, convert their land into a howling wilderness, and write over their untimely graves: Here lies the work of "American assimilation." But who, sir, wants this cruel and unnecessary war continued until the peace of death is everywhere established? Not the liberty-loving, humane people of America, but the greedy syndicates, speculators, and exploiters now hovering around the islands like hungry buzzards watching for their prey. But it is insisted the war is again over. I say again, because it has already ended several times since it first began.

Why, Mr. Chairman, up to this time we have only been fighting the Christian people in the Philippines. The non-Christian people have been permitted to live in peace, undisturbed in the enjoyment of their slaves and concubines. And we have it from the lips of witnesses who ought to know that when we undertake to abolish slavery and polygamy among those people and bring them under American sovereignty and the moral rules of American institutions we will have with them such a war as we have never had before in those islands. It is said they would rather give up their lives than slavery and polygamy.

But I admit, Mr. Chairman, that there is a semblance of peace in the islands, one which has been obtained very largely under false pretense, by promising the Filipinos that if they would lay down their arms they would soon become American citizens and be admitted into the Union as such. Governor Taft declared before our committee that the Federal party in the Philippines had done more, perhaps, than any other agency to secure peace among those people, and one of the main planks in the platform of that party favors a Territorial form of government for the Philippines and finally their admission into the Union as a State, their people to become citizens of the United States and be treated as such under our Constitution. We have the evidence that the Filipinos have been persuaded by their leaders and by American officers to believe that all this will be brought about if they will cease hostilities.

Two members of the Philippine Commission and hundreds of officers under the American Government are members of the Federal party. I do not say the American Commissioners have made such promises, but I have no doubt but the American Commissioners in their public meetings did give the Filipinos to understand that Congress would give them much freer trade with the United States than it has, and a much more liberal government than it will. I do not say our Commissioners were acting in bad faith, but they were disappointed in what Congress has done, and will be further disappointed in what Congress shall still do. The members of this Federal party are bitterly opposed to colonial government in every form.

Now, when those Filipinos learn, as they must learn, that they are not to be given a territorial government under the Constitution and finally admitted as a State into the Union; that they are not to become citizens of the United States, but held as subjects and governed as colonists; when they learn, as they must learn, that they are to be governed without their consent and taxed against their will, why, will they not resist the American yoke of tyranny as the American colonies resisted the British yoke in 1775? Has human nature so changed, or is the wrong of a republic any less offensive than that of an empire? Is not liberty just as precious now as then? Sir, I will not compare the American colonies to the Philippine Islands, but I will compare the treatment of the American colonies by Great Britain to the treatment of the Philippine Islands by the American Government. And no one can read the causes and history of the American Revolution without being strongly impressed with the very striking resemblance between the legislation with which Great Britain sought to oppress the American colonies and the legislation which the American Congress is attempting to inflict upon the Philippine Islands. And what a striking similarity you will find between the arguments used in the British Parliament for and against the right of one people to tax and govern another without their consent and the arguments made in the American Congress on that same subject.

For it must be remembered that while Great Britain was engaged in oppressing the American colonies they had their loyal friends and supporters in the British Parliament, who had the courage and humanity to rise and defend the colonies against the abuses of the British Government. And these distinguished patriots were not so severely criticised for their action as members of the American Congress in this day who have the courage and humanity to defend the Filipinos against the abuses of the American Government. Sir, I will not charge that we have our Whigs and Tories in the American Congress, but I will say that nearly every argument used by the Tories in the British Parliament in 1775 in favor of taxing and governing the American colonies without their consent has been repeated by some Republican leader in the Senate or House of Representatives in favor of taxing and governing the Filipinos against their will.

Why, the Tories insisted that the taxes which they sought to impose upon the American colonies were for their benefit. So say the Republican Senaters and Representatives with reference to our tax on the Filipinos. The Tory insisted that at least enough tax should be left upon the colonies to force them to admit England's right to tax them. A Republican Senator recently declared that we should govern the Filipinos by force until they acknowledged our right to govern them.

Why, sir, the British insisted then that what they were doing was for the benefit of the colonies. And when they could not persuade it into their heads they undertook to shoot it into their bodies, just as we are doing in the Philippine Islands. And I have no doubt but Great Britain boasted that she too was proceeding in the cause of the Almighty. How often has the cruel tyrant who sought to oppress and crush a defenseless people done it in the name of the Lord. Sir, we have always flattered ourselves that in that great Revolutionary struggle the Almighty was on the side of American liberty, and I believe in such earthly struggles He is always on the side of human liberty and against oppression, whether by an empire or republic.

History, sir, will draw this parallel between the cruelties of Great Britain and those of our own Government much stronger than I have been able to make it.

Another very striking coincidence is, while Massachusetts was the first colony to openly resist British oppression, a distinguished son of Massachusetts is the first to lead American oppression against the Filipinos. But, thank God, Massachusetts has another distinguished son to speak for that same personal liberty for which his glorious ancestors so nobly contended. Little did Washington ever dream that the sons of the American Revolution would ever attempt to force upon a foreign and defenseless people that same yoke of tyranny against which their fathers so bravely fought and so gloriously triumphed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why should we wander from the precious paths of liberty and peace marked out by the fathers of the Republic and take to the slough of despotism and despair?

It is said, sir, that we are out in search of new markets, that we need those islands in our business and must have them at any cost. Let us first see what their trade is worth and then count its cost. The most we have exported to those islands in any one year is less than $4,000,000, and a large portion of this was coin and supplies for our soldiers. And yet if all this were profit it would take over a hundred years to get back the six hundred millions we have already expended there, according to the estimate of a very reliable Republican Senator. And our expenses there are still going on, as shown by the annual increase for our Army and Navy.

The annual appropriation for the Army for the year ending June 30, 1898, was $23,193,392, and for the year ending June 30, 1902, $115,734,049, an increase of over $92,000,000. The appropriation for the Navy for the year ending June 30, 1898, was $33,003,234.19, and for the year ending June 30, 1902, $78,101,791, an increase of over $45,000,000. Total increase of the annual appropriations for Army and Navy since 1898 over $137,000,000. Most all due to the militarism of this new colonial policy.

Who can compare our great expenses in the Philippines with the small trade of the islands and say it is not a very poor investment? Besides, sir, I have not taken into account the several thousand brave American soldiers who have lost their precious lives in this unnecessary war, and whose aged mothers, bereaved widows, and dependent children will go upon our pension roll; nor have I taken into this account the several thousand American soldiers who have returned from the islands in poor health, with their systems poisoned with some of the dreadful diseases common to that tropical country, and most all of whom will deserve and receive liberal pensions from the American Government; nor have I yet included in this cost the saddest consideration of all. I refer to the several hundred American soldiers who were brought back from the Philippine Islands as poor, unfortunate lunatics, many of them raving maniacs, made so by the severe heat and hardships to which they were subjected in fighting for a country we did not need.

Great Britain, without any loss of money or life, has had a greater share of the Philippine trade than the United States. We do not have to own a people to secure their trade. We have much more of Canada's trade than Great Britain, and yet Canada is Great Britain's colony and not ours. We have a splendid trade with England, and yet we have never attempted to make an adopted daughter of our mother country.

You can never force a people to trade with you by the use of the sword. The truth is the Filipinos have been reduced to such poverty and desolation by several hundred years of war and oppression it will be some time before they become very profitable customers to any people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. But if we should pursue a policy that would establish friendly relations between the United States and the Philippines, we would certainly secure much of their trade.

There are many ways in which we might have used for the benefit of our own people these large sums of money wasted on the Philippines. Much of it might have been very profitably expended to improve our rivers, thereby cheapening the transportation of products and giving the people a better price for what they have to sell and a better bargain in what they have to buy. Much of it might have been very wisely expended in improving our mail facilities among the people, giving them free delivery wherever desired, and a large portion of the money wasted on those islands might have been very justly used to give more liberal pensions to the old soldiers who fought so bravely and so well for the good and glory of our own people and our own country.

Mr. Chairman, who are to be benefited for the money and the men we are daily sacrificing in this foreign war? Listen to the testimony of Governor Taft, the head of the American government in the Philippines, and see who these beneficiaries are. In his testimony before the Senate committee, he said the Philippine Islands would furnish a splendid field for American investors. He stated before our committee that there was a regular swarm of exploiters in the islands now with all kinds of schemes. They are there waiting for the special privileges of this bill. They are there waiting for an opportunity to appropriate as fast as possible the fertile lands, the fine timbers, the precious minerals, and valuable franchises in the islands, which rightfully belong to the Filipino people.

While the bill under consideration regards 40 acres sufficient for a farmer in the Philippines it allows a corporation to own 5,000 acres for agricultural purposes. As a reason for limiting the Filipino farmer to 40 acres it is said that 40 in the Philippines is equivalent to 160 acres in the United States. Then the 5,000 acres in the Philippines, which a corporation of three Americans may own, is equivalent to 20,000 acres in the United States. This is not the only provision in the bill where the Republicans show their accustomed preference for corporations.

When the genial gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] declared that the Filipinos were very friendly to the Americans since they had learned that we did not want their property, it was very evident he had not read the bill which he was so eloquently defending. While he and his Republican colleagues are prating about giving liberty to the Filipinos, by this bill they are authorizing the Philippine Commission to vote away to American corporations all the valuable lands, timbers, minerals, and franchises of the Filipinos without their consent or approval. And this, sir, they call liberal government. Indeed it is liberal, not for the Filipinos, but for the American beneficiaries.

On account of the war and its dreadful consequences property of all kinds in the Philippines has a very low value, and under such conditions to grant away to corporations large tracts of their best lands instead of reserving them for future homes for their own people is bold, daylight robbery, ten times worse than Great Britain ever treated the American colonies. While this bill does not authorize the sale of timber lands except those suitable for agriculture, yet it does authorize the issue of a license to cut timber under certain regulations, and who does not know that when a lot of timber sharks are turned loose on those fine timbers they will make quick work of everything valuable, regardless of any and all restrictions?

Why should we dispose of their public property before we decide whether they are to remain a part of the United States or become an independent country of their own? Professor Schurman, president of the first Philippine Commission, appointed by President McKinley, discussing this question, said:

> We have no right to vote away their public property and franchises without their joint consent. If Filipinos as legislators and administrators are to join us in the government of the archipelago, why should the weightiest and most important business be disposed of before their admittance?

General MacArthur, in his testimony before the Senate committee, expressed a similar opinion. Mr. Chairman, if all the privileges and franchises provided in this bill are granted, it will not be long till American syndicates will own the very cream of the islands. The most valuable lands, timbers, minerals, and franchises will soon be theirs. Railroads will be built where they will be most profitable to American investors, and not always for the best interest of the Filipinos. The native will scarcely be allowed the poor privilege of working on their farms or in their factories, for these greedy exploiters are already clamoring for the importation of Chinese labor.

Yes, the battlefields which we have drenched with so much innocent blood will soon be covered with magnificent plantations, and upon the untimely graves we have made will be erected splendid American factories; but all this will not bring a single penny to the American farmer or workingman in this country. Governor Taft stated before our committee that the American workingman could not endure the hot sun of that tropical country, nor would the American farmer or laboring man care to subject himself to all the oriental diseases so common in the Philippines.

And so it must be plain to all that the craving speculators now in the Philippines or on their way will receive the principal profits from these islands, while the American farmer and laboring man will be taxed to maintain a large army and expensive navy to preserve these distant possessions. Let me make this further suggestion to the plain American people who remain here at home, pay the taxes, and receive no share in these foreign profits: The more American capital that goes to the Philippines for investment, the less will remain at home to develop our own country. If the millions of American capital which will go to those islands could be used here at home in building new railroads, in establishing new factories, in opening new mines, in starting new industries, this would give additional employment to the American workingman, additional comfort and happiness to the American people, and additional greatness and grandeur to the American Republic.

But the millions of capital which leave this country for the Philippine Islands will give no additional employment to the American workingman and no additional comfort to the American people, because it will be used to employ the Chinese labor of the islands and such cheap oriental labor as may be imported.

Mr. Chairman, before we undertake to dispose of the public property of these people, before we grant away to corporations their lands and their franchises, we ought to determine whether it is our purpose to retain those islands permanently or not. While the war was going on you declared that you could not treat with a people in arms. But now you claim that the war is over and the way is clear for civil government. The Federal party, composed, as Governor Taft says, of Filipinos who are friendly to the United States and who desire to be incorporated into the United States as American citizens, have presented their memorial to Congress, asking us to define the status of their people—to say whether they are Americans or not. They express a great desire to be recognized as Americans, but declare most positively that they will not accept colonial government in any form. They are entitled to an answer; the American people are also entitled to an answer.

If you do not believe the Filipinos are qualified for American citizenship at this time, will you say that it is your purpose to make American citizens out of them at some future time, and eventually admit them into the Union? If that be your purpose, then define your policy, so it can be submitted to the American people for their judgment. Unless it is your intention to admit them into the Union under the Constitution as American citizens to compete with American workingmen and participate in American government or to recognize their independence, then, sir, you have but one course left, and that is to hold the islands as colonies and govern their people as subjects. If this be your purpose, the Filipino people are entitled to know it and the American people are entitled to know it.

Some leading Republicans now supporting the Administration still insist they are opposed to the permanent retention of the islands. I suppose they are in favor of a ninety-nine-year lease until the craving exploiters behind their mercenary policy have stripped the islands of everything that is valuable. You say you can not give them self-government now because they are not qualified for it. Who says they are not qualified for it? Why, the American officeholders in the islands and perhaps a few of the Filipino officeholders who are enjoying good salaries under the American Government.

But all the evidence we have shows that the Filipinos are a Christian people, quick to learn, kind, peaceable, obedient, virtuous, and devoted to their domestic relations. A large per cent of them can read and write in Spanish or their native language, many of them are highly educated, some graduates of foreign colleges. They have had their own schools and colleges in the islands for over three hundred years.

Their lawyers, their teachers, their business men, will compare favorably with the best of these classes in many other countries. And the American Government has found among their number men able enough and learned enough to fill positions of the highest responsibility in the Philippine government, members of the Philippine Commission, chief justice of the supreme court, governors of provinces, heads of bureaus, and thousands of other positions of less importance. Sir, if the Philippine Government can find so many Filipinos capable of filling the highest positions in the Philippine government, why could not the Filipino people, if left without American interference, find among their able and educated citizens men capable of forming and maintaining a good Filipino government adapted to the wishes and necessities of the Filipino people, allowing them to develop along their own racial lines?

No one claims they would be qualified to administer an American government like our own as well as Americans do, but it would be their own government, made and administered to suit their own people; and the fact that America had done so much to achieve their independence would be notice to the civilized world not to interfere. I believe it was Henry Clay who declared: "It is the doctrine of thrones that man is too ignorant to govern himself? I contend it is to arraign the disposition of Providence himself to suppose that He has created beings incapable of governing themselves and to be trampled on by kings. Self-government is the natural government of man." Who can find a more happy solution of this question for the benefit of those people and the general welfare of our own?

I was about to overlook another class who have some interest in retaining these islands. I refer to the American officeholders in the Philippines. There is no question but what most of them will very cordially support a policy that enables them to hold onto their jobs as long as possible. If they can have their way it will be a long time before the Filipino will be capable of governing himself. To show you how deeply this class is interested let me give you a list of some of the salaries received:

Governor Taft, president of the Commission	$20,000
Each of four commissioners	15,000
Secretary to the Commission	7,500
Chief justice, a Filipino	7,500
Six justices, two of them Filipinos	7,000
Treasurer	6,000
Auditor	6,000
Collector of customs	6,000
Head of department of posts	6,000
Chief of bureau of education	6,000

Mr. Chairman, there is not a State in the Union where such extravagant salaries are paid, and yet the Filipinos are much less able to pay high salaries than our own people. Besides, the Filipinos have no voice in fixing these high salaries. And when gentlemen declare what wonderful things we are doing for the Filipinos, let it be remembered that they with their own money are paying us a very high price for all these favors in addition to the rivers of blood we have shed in their unhappy land.

Mr. Chairman, high salaries may not be the worst feature of this carpetbag government if it proves to be anything like the one in Cuba, and it is liable to become much more corrupt on account of the great distance of the officers from the Government to which they owe responsibility.

It must be remembered that American officers 10,000 miles away will have a much better opportunity to conceal their corruption than public officers here at home, under our immediate observation and among people to whom they owe some responsibility.

But, Mr. Chairman, considering this whole Philippine business as a financial proposition, there can be no special gain to any American citizen outside of the scheming speculators to whom I have referred and who include, as I understand, some Senators and members of Congress.

But whether the annexation of those islands is profitable or unprofitable, I rest this case upon no such mercenary grounds as these. I am unwilling to barter away the sacred honor of my country for thirty pieces of silver. I am unwilling to buy American trade with American blood, to continue to slaughter innocent and defenseless women and children, to burn their peaceful homes to ashes and convert their land into a howling wilderness in order to make way not for liberty, but American greed and despotism.

I am unwilling to withhold longer from the Filipinos that personal liberty and national independence which I claim for my own people and my own country. I am unwilling to exchange the time-honored principles and traditions of the American Republic for the glittering jewels of a colonial empire, though they come to us on a platter of gold. Are we so dazzled with commerce and so blinded with trade that we have lost all devotion to human liberty and American institutions? Have we at last reached that fatal point in our civilization so eloquently described by the late President Harrison in these significant words, while discussing this subject, "God forbid that the day should ever come when in the American mind the thought of man as a consumer shall submerge the old American thought of man as a creature of God, endowed with inalienable rights?" (Views of an ex-President, p. 221.)

I place this sublime thought against some of the brilliant skyrockets of Indiana's more recent statesmen. I confess, sir, I entertain a much higher admiration for the immortal names of Washington and Lincoln, the great defenders of human liberty, than I do for some of our more modern statesmen of commercialism and imperialism, who place markets above men, commerce above humanity, and national trade above national honor. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Would to God we had a Washington or a Lincoln in the White House to-day to bring the American Government back from these new paths of commercialism and despotism into which it is so rapidly drifting and reestablish it once more upon the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Sir, I do most solemnly protest against this new spirit of greed and conquest which has carried us 10,000 miles from home to make war on a people whose only offense is the love of liberty. I not only protest against the cruel tortures and inhuman barbarities upon those people at their own homes, in their country, but I most earnestly protest against a policy which has brought so much hardship, suffering, disease, and death upon the brave American soldiers engaged in this unnecessary war.

Sir, in opposing this new colonial system I stand not only for the protection of the Filipino people against the indefensible assaults of the American Government, but I stand for the protection of the American people against the dangerous encroachment of the American Government upon their own constitutional rights and liberties. I stand for the defense of the American people against the willful waste of so much blood and treasure in trying to govern a people against their will. But how often do we hear it asserted what we owe to civilization, what we owe to this people and to that people. Sir, in my judgment, we owe more to the American people than any other people on the face of the earth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe in the doctrine that America should stand for America first and other countries afterwards, and it is for the general welfare of our own people that I protest against taking into the American family ten millions of people 10,000 miles away, alien in race, alien in customs, alien in habits, alien in education, alien in almost everything that helps to make good American citizenships; people who were never born to become Americans. When we say they are fit to govern themselves we do not admit that they are fit to govern us. For many years we have stubbornly resisted the immigration of Chinese into the United States, but now it is proposed to take into our national family in one lump ten millions of Orientals, including several hundred thousand Chinese, to compete with American workingmen and participate in American government.

Ex-President Harrison, on page 185 of his work entitled Views of an Ex-President, in discussing the annexation of these islands, said:

> We have done something out of line with American history, not in the matter of territorial expansion, but in the character of it. Heretofore the regions we have taken over have been contiguous to us, save in the case of Alaska, and indeed Alaska is contiguous, in the sense of being near. These annexed regions were also at the time of annexation either unpeopled or very sparsely peopled by civilized men, and were further, by their situation, climate, and soil adapted to the use of an increasing American population. We have now acquired insular regions situated in the Tropics and in another hemisphere, and hence unsuitable for American settlers, even if they were not, as they are, already populated, and their lands already largely taken up.
> We have taken over people rather than lands, and these chiefly of other race stocks, for there are "diversities of tongues." The native labor is cheap and threatens competition, and there is a total absence of American ideas and methods of life and government among the eight or more millions of inhabitants in the Philippines. We have said that the Chinese will not "homologate;" and the Filipinos will certainly be slow. Out of the too late contemplation of these very real and serious problems has arisen the proposition to solve them, as many think, by wresting our Government from its constitutional basis; or at least, as all must agree, by the introduction of wholly new views of the status of the people of the territories, and of some startlingly new methods of dealing with them.

Sir, we already have race problems enough of our own without going 10,000 miles from home in search of others. The proposition presented by the minority has been criticised as an effort to scuttle. We did not scuttle away from Cuba, and we propose the same plan for the Philippines. It might have been better for Cuba if some of our officers had scuttled away from there before they did.

The bill offered by the minority is based upon the fundamental principle that self-government is the natural government of man; that a more powerful nation has no right to impose its government upon a foreign and unwilling people. By our bill we simply say to the Filipinos, lay down your arms and take up your liberty. We do not want your country. While your fertile valleys, your magnificent forests, and your precious minerals have been very inviting to American greed, they all belong to your people and to your country, and we will not have them.

Establish your own government as did the Cubans, and the old American flag that helped to drive from your shores your Spanish oppressors we will haul down as we did in Cuba in honor and in glory, amid the shouts and joys of your people, that you may raise in its stead the proud emblem of your own dear republic, to wave over a free and independent people with hearts full of love and admiration for the great American Republic. [Applause.] Then we will withdraw our gallant troops from your islands and carry Old Glory back to "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

We have had a costly and bitter experience in the government of people by the sword. We are ready to retire forever from this colonial business and forsake all such glories of war for the grander glories of peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCCLELLAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 2063. An act amending an act creating the middle district of Pennsylvania; and

H. R. 2066. An act to change the terms of the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4284) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. QUARLES, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, including amendment No. 14, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; that the Senate had receded from its amendment No. 13, and had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 15, and had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. FORAKER, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, we are here, the Representatives of the United States, to perform for our country the duties of Government; back of us are the millions of people who make up our nation. We hold in our keeping a trust committed to our care by those people, and it is a grave responsibility. In our legislation we should strive to conserve the people's best interests, our country's good. No thought of personal preferment, no desire for mere partisan profit should control our action or interfere with our deliberations, and yet, sir, what are the conditions? What do we find to be the course of action pursued by the leaders and guides of the party now in the majority? Naught but a departure from the principles upon which our country was founded, a betrayal of the rights of the people, and an abject surrender to the demands of organized rapacity and greed, the most shameful that has ever been recorded on the pages of history.

The despoiling of the Egyptians by the children of Israel was a part recompense of over a century of servitude; the tortures of the Inquisition were the result of religious fanaticism, a relic of the Dark Ages; the robberies and inhuman atrocities committed by England's brood in Ireland are the fruits of absentee landlordism and a long-established policy; the aggression and tyranny of George III in his acts toward the American colonies was but the logical carrying out of his inherited belief in the divine right of kings, a practical exposition of the tenets of monarchy and imperialism, but there is no excuse, no palliation, for the existence and continuance of any of these foul stains at this day and under this Government.

We talk loudly and long of the advance of our country, and we are to-day at the world's front in all that goes to make up material greatness. We are not backward in intellectual culture; our hills and valleys, our mountains and plains, are dotted with universities, colleges, schoolhouses, and churches, and with them we have the free press, which is the mightiest engine of the world's progress. All these join in proclaiming that this nation leads in the van of civilization; but if we are to judge by the disclosures of the past few years, by the revelations of the record of the dominant party, then it is but a sham civilization, a thin veneer of pretension, through which the savage and barbarian oft appear. It is too true we are of this earth earthy and have only a hope that we may at some distant time reach a higher, nobler plane for our poor humanity as an inspiration for our perseverance toward maintaining right action as a nation.

There is naught in the heritage handed down to us from a brave, patriotic, liberty-loving, and heroic ancestry that could bring about the present state of affairs. The blood of our Revolutionary fathers was untainted, but the microbes of the trusts, the germs of ambition and greed, have gained entrance, swarmed, and multiplied until now almost the whole body politic is corrupted and diseased. It has been swift in the infection and growth. A few short years ago there was no such thing as the trusts, which now dominate and control the commercial industries of the country and even have their grasp upon the Government itself. The bill before us can not be well considered except by going down to the causes of its inception, its framing, and its support, and hence I have been led to speak of the trusts, as they are back of the bill and demanding its passage.

The taunt has been flung in our faces that a Democratic Administration failed to do aught to restrain trusts; that it was negligent in the performance of its duty, and therefore we of to-day are estopped from criticising Republican neglect and failure and Republican participation in trust criminality. If their charge was true, it would be no reason why we should not demand justice to-day; why we should not, in the name of humanity, call a halt in the criminal aggression and greed of organized rapacity. But, sir, the charge is false; it is untrue! Trusts are of recent growth. It has only been since 1896, since the induction of the Republican party into control of all branches of the Government, that trusts have reached the plentitude of power, strength, and insolence that they now possess, making them an enemy to the people and a menace to the Republic. Under Democratic administration they did not, could not, exist as to-day. [Applause.]

We are cited to the Sherman law of a dozen years ago, and that is used as evidence that trusts existed then and that the Republican party was trying to suppress them. Why, that law is admitted by themselves to be the veriest sham—a spider web to hold and restrain a tiger—and they have antagonized and defeated every effort that has ever been made to strengthen and make efficient the provisions of that law. Whenever we have tried to right the wrong—to amend the old law or pass a new one—we have been met by the statement from the Republican high priests that it was not necessary, because there were no trusts, even while their party in national convention, for political effect, I admit, included a denunciation of growing trusts in their platform. Still they kept up the cry, until the very food of the people was being held up by a trust, when an angry nation compelled the recognition of the existence of a mighty foe.

It is true the Attorney-General of the United States has been apparently making arrrangements to rebuke this one trust, but there are nearly 500 trusts in the land, all banded together to fight for continuance of the stolen privileges they hold, and what is needed is legislation that would reach every one of these trusts instead of a puny, farcical suit, under a confessedly weak statute, against one of these combinations. [Applause on Democratic side.]

We hear from the Republicans that we are shouting "Tariff! tariff!" as the cure-all for the evil effects of the trusts. Well, that is better than the Republicans are doing, for they offer no remedy, but favor their growth. To a certain extent the tariff does affect the trusts. We have the testimony of a high officer in one of the trusts, and a Republican, that the tariff is the mother of the trusts, and it is true that not until the present monstrous and iniquitous high protective tariff law came into force and effect was there such an unholy brood of evil combinations as exist at this time, and exist and are possible because of a high protective tariff.

Bad as the workings of the trusts are to us in our own land, a more deplorable result of their extension and expansion presents itself in the Philippines. Avarice, greed, robbery, militarism, imperialism, hypocrisy, falsehood, murder, rapine, torture, and savagery all follow in hideous procession in the train of trust dictation. This bill is here at their demand. I shall not attempt to analyze the bill item by item. Others may analyze, dissect it with their scalpels, melt it in their crucibles, bray it in their mortars, and disclose its base ingredients, but as for myself I do not regard it as being worth the trouble. The bill is essentially and fundamentally bad; so bad that no modifications can improve its vicious character without wholly destroying it.

We are in the Philippines not as a consequence of our war with Spain, but by reason of the will of a combination, a trust, in this country that is seeking the spoliation of those islands.

While Cuba was yet struggling for her freedom the members of this side of the House steadily labored to bring about the recognition of her independence. If we had succeeded, there is not the shadow of a doubt but our late as well as our present war would have been avoided, Cuba would have achieved her independence, and without question ere this would have sought admission to the United States. Failing in our efforts for recognition of Cuba, we advocated and plead for armed intervention. The growing syndicates were opposed to our success, and for months and months you on that side of this Chamber sat silent, at the dictation of the trusts, and dared not to open your mouths on the question until there was such a sentiment aroused throughout the length and breadth of the country that if you had longer remained dumb and inactive there would have been a holocaust among you in comparison with which the horror at Martinique would have seemed but as an infant's breath. [Applause.]

War was proclaimed in the name of humanity, and conquest and expansion of territory was solemnly declared to have no place in the designs of the Government in its conduct of the war.

Dewey at Manila and Schley at Santiago destroyed the Spanish power. The war should then have ended, and the people freed from Spanish domination and misrule in Cuba, and the people freed from Spanish cruelty and authority in the Philippines should have been started on the high destiny of nations among the nations of the earth, with our declaration that they were, ought to be, and should be free and independent nations. This was, indeed, the first thought of the Administration, it was the expectation of the American people. Every spark of manhood kindled, every patriotic heart throbbed quickly, every thought of liberty, all the memories of our own history, with the record of our father's struggles for freedom, all thrilled in glad pulsations in the hope that to us was to be given the grand spectacle of two nations being born in a day, and two peoples being given the opportunity of enjoying the fruits of their labor under God's gift of freedom. [Applause.]

But this was not to be. Milton, in his Paradise Lost, tells us how, while Lucifer was yet high in the counsels of the Almighty, he listened to the whisperings and foul suggestions of ambition, and then entered upon his rebellious career and downfall. Some such malevolent imp of hell was here in Washington four years ago, and in the rooms of the Arlington whispered to the Administration leaders the immense possibilities for plunder and profit that would be opened up in those isles of the Orient if they were held. Then a wonderful change came over the spirit of the dreams of Republicans. Greed consumed their souls. Avarice burned their consciences and destroyed their judgment. They heeded not the story of Ulysses and his comrades who stopped their ears when they came within the sound of the seductive songs of the siren, but fell over each other in their mad rush to be in on the ground floor of the proposed scheme of plunder.

Hypnotized by the voice of the trusts, they forgot their solemn pledges, forgot the traditions of the past, forgot the proud boast that this was the land of the free; that for two hundred years before the days when our Revolutionary heroes were giving their lives that we might be free, the Filipinos were shedding their blood with the same aspirations and hopes of freedom and independence.

Before the ink was dry on the treaty which allowed us Manila and Manila Bay, aye, before the treaty was signed, a secret cablegram was sent around the world to American officials in Manila instructing them to go out beyond the limits of Manila and spy out the land and report as to timber and minerals.

The despoiling of the Filipinos had begun, and the spark of liberty just beginning to glow in Filipino hearts at the thought of its speedy realization was extinguished by the ruthless heel of one who assumed to be the personification of liberty.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] in his attempted defense of the Republican party is not an accurate historian when he distorts and contradicts or ignores the official reports of Dewey, Pratt, Anderson, Wildman, and all of the men on the ground at the time, nor when he said that "there never was a time when we could have sailed away from there with honor to ourselves or safety to the people of the Philippines;" but as he was forced to admit that he did not know anything at all about part of the subject upon which he spoke at so much length, I will give him the benefit of the assumption that he knows still less about the rest. All over this land the ministers of every denomination and creed have joined with the most prominent laymen in the business, professional, and laboring world in appealing to this body, this Congress, to give back to the Filipinos that which is theirs by right.

It is the result of the criminal acts of aggression in the most virulent form on the part of the Republican party that we have this problem to meet. We must face the question, What shall we do with the Philippines? To the Cubans, who, as Admiral Dewey says, are not as capable of self-government as the Filipinos, we have given freedom and quasi independence. Shall we, can we in justice and equity do less for the Philippines? Then comes the immediate question, When shall we stand aside, call home our frigates of war, withdraw our armies, and place the Filipinos on an equality with the Cubans by giving them their freedom and independence?

The answer the Republicans make in this bill is, "Ultimately;" some time in the dim and misty future; in a few generations, when we have desolated their country, given the trusts a monopoly of their hemp and tobacco, and permitted syndicates to rob and carry away their vast forests of mahogany and valuable timber, under the protection and guard of American soldiers. You say, "By and by we will give them their freedom; 'ultimately,' when they know us a great deal better; when we have taught them that the Declaration of Independence is a lie, that Washington was only a selfish partisan, that Jefferson, Franklin, Patrick Henry, and Abraham Lincoln were hypocrites, deserving only of contempt." Then, say you, grant them their coveted independence.

The minority substitute, the Democratic measure, is based on entirely different principles. We say to them, "You are of right free. We concede the claim for which you have contended and been willing to lay down your lives. We concede it now, not in a few generations (if we do not forget it), but now, immediately, according to the meaning of that word in the intercourse of nations, as soon as, after full and free and friendly conferences or conventions of your people, you shall form a republic, to which we can turn over the control of the islands, and arrange for repayment of our legitimate expenditures, giving you credit for the revenues we have collected from you." That is what our bill says; that is Democratic principle on the Philippine question.

This course, as outlined in accordance with Democratic policy, meets the demands of the Christian people of the land; it meets the views of every humanitarian, of every loyal citizen, and would give us the respect of the world. In our intercourse with the Filipinos I agree with a correspondent, a Christian minister, who writes me, "Conciliation and helpfulness, not subordination, must be our watchword." These islands are in our power to do with as we list. We can easily conciliate that people by justice and helpfulness, or we can keep on with our inhuman butchery till Eastern nations interfere. We have an inkling that they may do this in the action of England and Germany denying our claim to the Sulu Islands.

Our present policy will make us a divided people, if it is continued till we provoke the interference of foreign nations. Our present brutal course of barbarity and butchery is losing us our prestige and the high respect of other nations. England dictates to us a colonial policy, and yet will be the first to turn against us in time of storm.

We will be stronger and more free in the East with a Philippine republic than with an insubordinate colony. Any man with an ounce of common sense can see this. Suppose to-day that Japan should declare war against us. With our hands bound by the antagonism of the millions of the inhabitants of the Philippines, we would be defeated at the outset. Give them their independence, and their whole army would fight for us anywhere. As it is, they will fight against us as long as they have life, as they have ever against Spain. We may depopulate the islands by butchery, but we will never subdue that people even to the extent we have subdued the Indians in this country in the last four hundred years.

If you Republicans determine to govern the Filipinos by a partisan nabob or grand mogul sent from Washington, you must avoid fooling with the buzz saw of human equality and popular rights.

When King John of England was forced to yield to the demands of his people, the greatest privilege the Magna Charta gave to the English subjects was the right of trial by jury, and ever since it has been cherished and handed down from age to age as the chief palladium of liberty; and yet you free-born American citizens, clothed yourselves in all the panoply of liberty and equality, would deny to the inhabitants of your American province this right of trial by jury. Where is your boasted righteousness and justice?

What has happened in the Philippines since we have been there? Bloodthirsty conquest, rapine, and desolation. But the one thing that has happened, creating more amazement and consternation to our American people than anything else, has been the revelation that officers of our Army, sent to the Philippines in the cause of "benevolent assimilation," have repeatedly ordered and compelled the infliction of torture, not alone of an armed enemy, but upon inoffensive, helpless victims for the purpose of extorting confession or extracting information.

The war between the States from 1861 to 1865 familiarized the adults of this generation of America with the severity, the suffering, and hardships that follow in the horrible path of war, but torture, which we supposed had been buried with the Dark Ages, physical torture, we were not prepared for, and when the news came all America was startled and shocked. There has existed in the minds of our people admiration and respect for our soldiery. We have had a feeling for Army officers akin to worship. We had placed them on a pedestal of regard, and thought that they were all gentlemen of honor and humanity, as well as of bravery. We thought the "bravest are the tenderest," and that no man who carried a commission in our Army could do aught that would cause us to hang our heads in shame.

How changed is all this! Because of the acts of some high in command, the once fair escutcheon of our warrior's honor is stained with disgrace and barbarity.

During October, 1901, Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith, in command of the Sixth Brigade in the Philippines, commonly known now by the refined appellation of "Hell-roaring Jake," gave orders to Maj. L. W. T. Waller that he "wanted no prisoners taken, meaning thereby that giving quarter is not desired or required;" that he "wishes you to kill and burn, and the more you kill and burn the better you will please me. The interior of Samar must be made a howling wilderness."

This order of General Smith commands the killing of everybody over the age of 10, as he placed that limit upon his order in reply to a question, whether they were friendly or hostile, whether they possessed arms or ever had possessed any. It also ordered the killing of women as well as men, and it was literally carried out.

Now, the Army is not to be censured for this order, and no speaker on this side of the House—the voice of no Democratic speaker anywhere has been heard in criticism or abuse of the Army because of this order of an epauletted bully and brute, but there is a political phase about this which has an extremely bad odor.

This inhuman order was known to the Secretary of War and hidden among the "secret archives" of his Department for six months, while the Secretary was assuring the Senate Philippines Committee that he had furnished all orders and cases of alleged cruelty that were on record in the Department or in his possession. This and the further fact that the Department has upheld other officers in their outrages leads one to believe, nay, makes it certain, that these officers have acted under instructions from Washington, and emphasizes the fact that the trusts, the masters of the Republican party, are in such close communion with the infernal regions that the souls of the puppets they place in charge of governmental affairs are sizzled and seared to an unrecognizable crisp by their contact with their bosses.

The horrible "water cure," which this Administration has made familiar to Americans for the first time, is not a new invention. It is a bequest from the Spanish inquisition, but it had been long since done away with in civilized lands. The last case where it was employed was in Toulouse, France, in 1763, one hundred and forty years ago, when it was used on an innocent, good, and virtuous old man, Jean Calas, 64 years of age. A hundred years earlier this outrageous torture would have excited no comment, but new ideas had come with new generations. Tolerance and humanity were showing their fair faces to the people of Europe. The philosopher Voltaire came to the defense of Calas, and, by his fiery eloquence and great talent in his denunciation of this persecution, so wrought upon the conscience and sensibilities of France as to make this the last case of torture inflicted within the realm.

Is our administration harking back to the times before Voltaire? The use of the "water cure" is admitted and apologized for by the gentlemen on the other side. Is it true that the American church takes no interest in the barbarous tortures carried on in the Philippines? Because the Filipinos commit acts of atrocity and cruelty shall we strive to exceed them in fiendish torture? Would that another genius like Voltaire might rise and arouse the sympathies and just indignation of the American people at this foul blot upon our national honor. [Applause.]

I insist, however, that it is not the Army that is to blame, but the wicked and dastardly policy of the Republican party, and that party must be held responsible for all the cruelty and torture committed either by our soldiers or by the Filipinos.

My friend the distinguished and eloquent gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has been heard on this measure. He has, in fact, been heard twice at least, and in two different ways. On the evening of March 2, the anniversary of the birth of the Irish patriot and martyr, Robert Emmet, he made a fiery speech in the Columbia Theater, this city, in which he vigorously declared himself in favor of the independence of Ireland; he wanted it right away, or sooner; then he wanted the independence of the South African republics, and of all people who were struggling for liberty. On Friday last, with an alacrity that would do honor to the protean changes of the theatrical board, he faced squarely about and took the other side of the question here on the floor of the House. He was in favor of the Republican bill; in favor of completely subjugating the Filipinos and refusing them independence.

Four months ago, yea, less than that, he was in favor, heart and soul, of the independence of the Filipinos. But that was in a theater. Now he is opposed to it, because, forsooth, the Filipinos do not want independence. He declares it, he himself has said it. Probably they are just fighting and dying for fun. They don't want independence, but they combine, plan, plot, conspire in order to obtain it. They do not want independence; they suffer the tortures of the water cure rather than give up their demand for it, but the gentleman from California knows much better than they do that they do not want it at all, and would be very much distressed if we should insist on their having it. Every mother sends not only her husband, but her kids of 10 to do battle with the invaders, so "Hell-roaring Jake" says, but they do not want independence. The eloquent gentleman declares that they are quite ignorant, but they are not so densely ignorant, it seems, as not to want to govern themselves.

My friend of the sock and buskin makes another discovery. He tells us that no American general or admiral ever explicitly promised Aguinaldo independence for his people, though he always persistently demanded it. Is it possible to overestimate the importance of this discovery? Yet, as it has never been asserted by an American that a definite promise of Filipino independence was made to Aguinaldo or anybody else, it was hardly necessary to deny it so vehemently. As General Anderson says:

> Whether Admiral Dewey and Consuls Pratt, Wildman, and Williams did or did not give Aguinaldo assurances that a Filipino government would be recognized, the Filipinos certainly thought so.

Was not our whole history a promise of independence? Our Constitution was a promise; our immortal bill of rights was a promise. The thrilling speeches of our great orators were a promise; the songs of our poets were a promise, and our liberty-breathing salutation to Bolivar, Toussaint L'Ouverture, Kosciusko, and Kossuth was a solemn promise, sworn to on all the evangels of our faith. [Applause.]

You make hypocritical claims to be lovers of and proud of our liberty; you appeal to the leaders of the past, but you ignore their teachings. The names of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln fall flippantly from your lips, but you turn aside from their words of wisdom and warning, and dare not repeat them, for they condemn your policy and your acts. With veriest sacrilege you profane the name of Lincoln by comparing him with your leader of to-day. You profess to admire Grant, but you disgrace his name and desecrate his memory by placing him in the same category with "Hell-roaring Jake."

Even McKinley, whom you eulogize so highly with pretentious sounds, while you charge us with garbling his words, yet you do not dare to quote his public speeches, but hide behind his alleged sayings in pretended interviews.

Another of your preposterous claims that your party is the proprietor of the American Army—a claim the insolence of which is only equaled by its monotonous repetition. The bare statement of your claim carries its refutation, but I indignantly deny your right to and the truth of the claim. Instead of being the private property of the Republican party, the American Army, owned by no party, is at once the ward and the champion of the whole American people. Recruited from all ranks and from all sections of the country, it is, in its normal character, the defender of popular rights. It contains as many Democrats as Republicans—probably more.

In only one way is the Army Republican; its atrocities are Republican; its debaucheries are the result or a sincere effort to carry out the infamous policy of your party. The water cure is a Republican institution; Republican because a legitimate and inevitable result of your schemes of conquest and spoliation. What a descent from the party of Lincoln and Sumner is the Republican party of the year of our Lord 1902. To-day "Uncle Tom's" cabin is being burned, remorselessly burned, over his head in the Philippines. John Brown's body has completely moldered in its grave, and his soul has marched far beyond the confines of the grewsome graveyard which the Republican party calls its own.

The Democratic party may not be perfect—I admit it is not; it may not always have been right in its policies, its leaders may not always have been either honest or great, but compared with the Republican party, its policies have been as clear and true as the sunlight, and its leaders as pure as the dewdrop on the hillside. Its principles and aims have ever been for the uplift, protection, and betterment of the people. It has been a rock standing against the encroachment of centralization, corruption, and trust domination, and on this question we are for extending the blessings of freedom, liberty, and independence to a long-struggling and long-suffering race; we are for the defense of the Army against Republican uncleanness, and believe that everywhere, in all climes, among all peoples, and under all circumstances, Democratic doctrines of humanity, equality, liberty, and justice must and will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, by invitation of the Committee on Immigration of the Senate, on Wednesday, June 18, I made an argument in favor of an educational test for immigrants, which I think will be of interest to members of the House and of the Senate as well, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may print my remarks in the RECORD.

The argument referred to is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I appear with you at this time to argue in favor of House bill No. 12199, which I had the honor to report to the House from the committee of which I am chairman. With the exceptions I shall mention in my argument, I hope the bill will pass the Senate substantially as it came from the House.

I understand, of course, that the honorable Senators composing this committee will give to the consideration of the bill that discriminating care and thoughtful attention which the importance of the subject treated demands. I venture, however, to briefly mention some of the features of this legislation which I hope will have due weight in your deliberations.

You will admit, gentlemen, that it is unusual for a committee to report unanimously in favor of a bill covering a controversial subject. Such a report was made in favor of the bill reported by me to the House. That result was gained because the members of the committee sought to give to the House a comprehensive measure, symmetrical and harmonious in all its parts, and effective for the administration of the Bureau of Immigration.

The necessity of the law was imperative because no codification of the immigration laws had been made for twenty-five years. The work of the officers having charge of the enforcement of the law was hampered, not only by the restrictions of court decisions on laws already existing, but also by the absence of provisions of law needed to meet changed conditions, and evasions which experience had taught aliens and their importers how to easily make.

The House bill as reported, therefore, may be said to have been framed with three things in view: First, to include all parts of existing laws which experience had proved effective or, which is of equal importance, had received the sanction of judicial interpretation; second, to insert such changes as were necessary to make the administration of the law conform to judicial decisions by which existing law had been made inoperative; third, to add such new provisions of law as were necessary to meet new or changed conditions, and bring within the purview of the public statutes certain features now only partially reached through decisions of the Treasury Department officials.

Many weeks' earnest and careful thought were given to the formation of the bill, and all the expert knowledge available was utilized, so that the completed bill might serve the purpose intended with the fullest possible success, while inflicting no unnec-es sary hardships upon either the transportation lines of land or sea bringing the aliens to our country or upon the aliens themselves.

Knowing how equally patient and conscientious work of past Congressional committees had been rendered fruitless and needed legislation throttled by the addition of extraneous matter, offered in the shape of amendments ostensibly for the purpose of perfecting but really with the effect of ultimately defeating pending legislation, I urgently opposed in the House, while the bill was under consideration, all amendments that led in any other direction than that planned by the committee I had the honor to represent.

That committee having unanimously placed in my hands a bill framed after most careful thought, embracing substantially the experience of the Treasury Department, as to what was needed, and indorsed personally, in writing, by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, and by the Commissioner-General of Immigration and his experts, as well as in the main essentials by the recent Industrial Commission, which had gone into the subject of immigration thoroughly and exhaustively. I felt it my duty to save this bill from the fate that had fallen to so many others. Knowing the urgent need of legislation at this session of Congress, and the danger of attempting too many things in one bill, I felt it was unfair to load down the bill with additions which might prevent the passage of the legislation itself.

Substantially as reported by the committee the bill passed the House, with the exception of the amendments prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors at immigrant stations and at the Capitol at Washington, and establishing an educational test.

For the reasons already stated, I believed it to be my duty to strenuously oppose these amendments. Whatever the merit of either proposition, I objected to loading down the bill with matters which could not but arouse antagonism that might endanger the passage of the bill. I was overruled and the House, by its action, put itself on record in favor of legislation such as is embraced in the amendments adopted.

At this time and before this committee I have nothing to offer concerning the sale of intoxicants at immigration stations and at the Capitol. If the Senate wishes to indorse these amendments it is their privilege to do so. I only plead that these or any other amendments shall not be permitted to endanger the bill, prepared with such patient labor and of itself and by itself so good for the administration of the immigration laws.

So, also, in regard to an educational test as a means of restriction of immigration. If you will not allow such an amendment to jeopardize the bill and thereby deprive the country of the general legislation so imperative upon this subject of immigration, I am content. But I most earnestly protest against the form of the amendment tacked on to the bill in the House to secure that result. When the amendment was under consideration in the House I pointed out several objections thereto which seemed to me sufficient to prevent the adoption of the amendment. It may be well to ask you to analyze the amendment and notice its exceedingly objectionable features in the form in which it now stands. The amendment says, page 4, line 21, of the bill:

All persons—

Note the words—

over 15 years of age and physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language or some other language.

The section denies admission to "all" persons. Thus it affects the immigration into the United States from Canada and Mexico, and applies, not only to the elements all wish to exclude, but also to the citizens of those countries along our border, north and south, who daily come into the United States for trade or otherwise and return to their homes at nightfall. It would apply to the 70,000 migratory "birds of passage" that annually come into New England at the beginning of the labor season and return at the end thereof. The test would have to be applied daily and would thus be so obnoxious as to provoke immediate retaliatory legislation by our neighbors, and there are quite as many citizens of this country who cross the Canadian line for trade and work as there are of the Canadians who cross the line for like purposes to this country.

Should this view be held to be correct, then the proviso, commencing on line 18, page 5, of the bill, designating certain places through which alone "all persons" may enter, acts with still more rigid force, for every citizen of Canada, for instance, from Vanceboro, Me., along the frontier to Newport, Vt., would have to enter the United States, if only to do a day's shopping, at those two places or "be adjudged to have entered the country unlawfully and shall be deported as by law provided."

I leave it to your good sense and sound judgment whether the matter in the educational test in the House bill should remain in that crude form, and if I am not justified in deprecating the addition of such a monstrosity to my committee bill as originally framed. I feel it my duty to most strenuously urge you to do one of two things, either to strike those sections from the bill, leaving it, as at first intended, a bill purely for the administration of the immigration service, or to incorporate in lieu thereof provisions to accomplish the purpose desired in a logical, effective, scientific, and unobjectionable manner.

Assuming that the vote of the House indicates a demand by the country for an educational test to be applied to aliens seeking admission to the United States, why not perfect such legislation in the best possible manner instead of placing upon the statute book a measure so crude and amateurish.

With the hope that this suggestion may meet your approval, I now submit for your earnest consideration a draft for an amendment which I have prepared and the substance of which may very properly be substituted for section 3 of the bill that passed the House. It is as follows:

That, to the classes of aliens now excluded by law from admission into the United States, there shall be added all aliens, other than citizens of the Dominion of Canada or of the Republic of Mexico or bona fide residents of the said Dominion or Republic for a continuous period of at least one year prior to seeking entrance to the United States, who have attained the age of 15 years and who can not read the English language or some other language, except as hereinafter provided; but any alien, other than Chinese or of Chinese descent, now lawfully resident in the United States, or any alien who may hereafter be lawfully admitted thereto, may bring into the United States, to join him as members of his family, his wife, his children under 15 years of age, and his parents or grandparents over 50 years of age, if they are otherwise admissible, whether they are so able to read or not.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of testing the ability of any alien to read, the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States on uniform pasteboard slips, each slip containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution, printed in double small pica type, in the various languages of the countries from which aliens migrate to the United States or which they profess their ability to read. Each alien shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in the language he may designate; and, if he shall fail to read such words intelligibly, he shall be refused admission and returned to the country whence he came at the expense of the vessel, transportation company, or corporation which brought him; and no two aliens listed on the same manifest shall be tested with the same slip: Provided, That any alien, other than a citizen of the Dominion of Canada or of the Republic of Mexico or a bona fide resident of the said Dominion or Republic for a continuous period of at least one year, whether able to read the English language or some other language or not able to do so, who shall enter the United States, except at the seaports thereof or at Vanceboro, Calais, Lowelltown, Houlton, Fort Fairfield, Me.; Newport or St. Albans, Alburgh, Island Pond, Richford, Vt.; Rouse's Point, Malone, Fort Covington, Ogensburg, Morristona, Nyando Bridge, Cape Vincent, Niagara Falls, Lewistown, or Buffalo, N. Y.; Detroit, Port Huron, or Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.; Pembina, N. Dak.; Sumas, Wash.; Laredo, El Paso, or Eagle Pass, Tex., or Nogales, Ariz., shall be adjudged to have entered the country unlawfully, and shall be deported as by law provided.

SEC. 3. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect the right of aliens who are seamen or members of railway-train crews to pass freely back and forth over the land or water boundaries of the United States in the pursuit of their respective callings; nor shall the provisions hereof operate to exclude aliens who are members of a race which, by the statistical records of the Bureau of Immigration, Treasury Department, shows an average annually of not more than 10 per centum of persons who can not read, said average to be computed upon the basis of the illiteracy shown in the statistics of the three fiscal years immediately preceding the year in which the educational test is applied.

The most superficial examination will show that this bill is a vast improvement upon the sections added by the House, and that it removes the serious defects therein, while it in no respect diminishes the efficiency of the test proposed to accomplish the result intended.

The proposed bill excepts from examination citizens of contiguous countries or those who have been bona fide residents thereof for a period of one year or more. It thus avoids interference with the neighborly interchange of visits along the frontier which have continued so long, and prevents annoying obstructions to the commercial and social intercourse with our neighbors, so indispensable and valuable, and to that reciprocal freedom of relations with our neighbors so conducive to comity and harmony between peoples of countries alien to each other.

The bill dispenses with the cost and labor of testing the ability to read of a people as to whose acquirements in that respect no question has been or need be raised.

It qualifies the broad language of the sections named in regard to aliens lawfully resident in the United States having the right to bring in their families, by excepting from such provision Chinese aliens. But for such exception it might be held that registered Chinese laborers were given such right, which clearly was not the intention of the author of the amendment. But certainly if there was such an ulterior purpose on the part of anyone, it was not the design of the House when it adopted the amendment.

My proposed amendment will tend still further to remove unnecessary obstruction to our commercial intercourse with foreign countries. Under a proper construction of the language of the amendment in the House bill it might be held by the administrative officers as well as by the courts that Congress did not intend to include alien members of train crews and alien seamen crossing our land or water boundaries in the pursuit of their respective vocations, but my amendment removes all doubt, because it expressly exempts from the educational test such aliens.

These details, however, important as they are in perfecting the features of the bill mentioned, are relatively of slight value compared with a feature of the proposed law somewhat unique and distinctive in such legislation. This feature meets successfully some of the most serious objections to the enactment of any legislation requiring an examination of aliens and the exhibition by them of having some standard of mental training above total illiteracy. The most ardent advocates of an educational test have freely confessed the practical difficulties to be met under any system heretofore devised, the delay and consequent congestion of numbers of aliens and their discomfort at the ports of entry, the large additional expense of caring for them during the extra time of detention, the increase of the official force, etc., but they have contended that the importance thereof justified submission to all such difficulties.

With all due modesty, Mr. Chairman, I feel justified in saying that these difficulties are minimized by the simple and entirely proper expedient I suggest. I have examined the statistics of alien immigrants arriving during the past three fiscal years as to their illiteracy, and I find that the various races maintain a practically uniform ratio of illiteracy, varying from less than half of 1 per cent of the total arrivals of one race (Scandinavian) to nearly 55 per cent of the arrivals of another (Turkish).

To examine all the Scandinavians, for example, to discover and turn back the 1 illiterate out of 400 arrivals, would be an expenditure of time and labor out of all proportion to the results to be attained. The same reasoning, only in a somewhat less degree, applies to many other races.

I submit herewith a compilation showing at a glance the percentage of illiteracy by races, taking the average of 1899, 1900, and 1901 of the different races represented in the alien immigration into the United States. It is as follows:

Statement showing percentage of immigrants who can not read, during the fiscal years 1899, 1900, and 1901.

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Bohemian and Moravian	1.8	Lithuanian	33.3
Bulgarian, Servian, etc	33.5	Magyar	10.3
Croatian and Slovenian	34	Polish	28.7
Dalmatian, Bosnian, etc	28.9	Portuguese	45.8
Dutch and Flemish	6.2	Roumanian	30.8
English	1.2	Russian	17
Finnish	1.5	Ruthenian (Russniak)	46.7
French	3.2	Scandinavian	.4
German	3.4	Scotch	1
Greek	20.2	Slovak	26.1
Hebrew	16.8	Spanish	7.9
Irish	3.1	Turkish	54.3
Italian, north	11.8	Welsh	2.5
Italian, south	48.2	Japanese	5

My amendment, therefore, provides that no examination shall be made to test the ability to read of aliens of those races which, for the three fiscal years preceding the test, have shown an average capacity in that respect which would appear to make the results in the way of excluding totally ignorant aliens too insignificant to justify the cost, labor, etc., involved in such examination. This average I have placed at 10 per cent. Although the establishment of any fixed ratio may seem to the casual observer somewhat arbitrary, perhaps even whimsical or prejudiced, I have accepted this advisedly and after a close scrutiny of the statistical reports of the United States Immigration Bureau and with the conviction, which no practical man would care to dispute, that some exact standard must be fixed.

I call your attention to another very important fact in connection with this new feature. It does not deal with countries but with races. It does not, therefore, discriminate against the citizens of any particular country as such, but treats aliens as individuals, apart from their political allegiance, and distinguishing them simply as races.

By this means we do not disturb the comity so desirable between our country and foreign governments. We avoid conflict with treaty obligations and apply our restrictive test exactly where it should be applied and where the effect sought will be thereby most certainly reached. If by this means any lenity is shown, it will be to those races from whose sturdy stock have sprung in bygone days the elements so conducive to our growth and prosperity.

In this connection there is another significant reflection. Environment enters largely into causes for racial conditions and prospective improvement. A child raised in a community where education is universal will absorb a degree of intelligence impossible under an environment of ignorance and degradation. There is a good foundation to build upon, and with those races which show a percentage of illiteracy of less than 10 per cent no risk is encountered in permitting them to be exempt from the educational test.

One illustration may be pertinent as to the effect of my proposed amendment and of the distinctive feature of the 10 per cent exemption suggested. The total immigration reported for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, numbered 487,918.

Deduct from this total the 62,562 children under 14 years of age, and the number to be considered will be 425,356.

Of this number the 10 per cent exemption would have applied to 153,445, of whom only 3,465 were unable to read.

This leaves 271,911 that would have been examined, and of these 114,122 were unable to read and would have been debarred; that is to say, about 26.8 per cent of the 425,356 immigrants over 14 years of age who applied for admission during that year.

Contrast the results attained by the proposed substitute with those from the sections in the bill. In the item of time saved alone there is a marked difference. As the bill now stands the test must be applied to all over 15 years of age. For the year ending June 30, 1901, the number under 14 years of age was 62,562. Assume that 25,000 may have been added to this number by placing the age limit at 15 years. Then under the bill the inspectors would have examined about 400,000 immigrants with the educational test. Under my substitute, as stated, the test would not apply to 153,445 of this number. I am quite sure you will appreciate the time saved by eliminating 38 per cent from the examination, especially when thereby the very small number of 3,465 only are admitted, and these of immigrants whose environment at home was such as to reduce to a minimum any risk attending their admission.

I feel that I can not emphasize too strongly this feature of environment in its effect upon the alien migrating to the United States. It is not my purpose to make invidious comparisons between peoples, but to state a palpable fact. Abundant illustration can be found right here in our own country to sustain the argument.

Since, then, the number affected by the suggested substitute is but 3,465, and these of races whose general intelligence, civilization, and progress justify the exception in their cases, and since by their admission the time and labor are saved by thus examining 38 per cent of the total number received, I submit that it presents an unanswerable argument in favor of my substitute.

One other feature may be mentioned. The simple and easily applied method suggested by my substitute will not only prove effective at all our own ports of entry, but as soon as adopted will impel, naturally, a sifting process at the place whence the emigration begins. It will be known there very soon that admission is denied at our ports to those races whose illiteracy is greater than the limit.

The emigrant will either not start at all or postpone his starting until he has acquired the foundation of knowledge sufficient to make his admission permissible and to guide his footsteps along the path that leads ultimately to American citizenship. The thirst for knowledge once aroused will not be quenched while life lasts, and even if the results in the present generation may be meager, the immigrant will be inspired with the necessity of broadening the opportunities of his offspring by the aid given through education in our schools.

Very much more may be said in advocacy of the general legislation wished for under this bill, but I will not impose upon your kind indulgence. I simply join with others who have addressed you in urging prompt and favorable action. The immigration service needs this bill. It needs this bill with the least possible delay. I trust your committee will appreciate the situation and act accordingly.

Many important measures have claimed the attention of the Fifty-seventh Congress. Some of these affect not only our standing at home, but our place among the family of nations. The future of the world's commerce lies in the balance. But in the decision of this question the welfare of our own people is at stake. The standard of wages, the standard of citizenship, the standard of our civilization are involved, and with them our power to command the position in the world's drama which destiny seems to have ordained we shall fill.

By this legislation, also, we continue and perfect that policy which has secured our labor from unjust and unfair competition and enabled it to develop the resources of our own land with such marvelous rapidity. Let us act promptly and wisely, to the end that our progress may continue, our prosperity receive no check, and our country be advanced still further along the course of intelligence, civilization, and righteous power that has been decreed for it, and continue the beacon light that shall ultimately guide the nations of the earth to liberty and peace.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER-GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, June 12, 1902.

Hon. W. B. SHATTUC,
Chairman Committee on Immigration and Naturalization,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your oral request for an expression of opinion, I have the honor to state that, in my judgment, there would be no difficulty whatever in operating under and carrying out the proposed amendment to the immigration law which reads as follows, viz: "Nor shall the provisions hereof operate to exclude aliens who are members of a race which, by the statistical records of the Bureau of Immigration, Treasury Department, shows an average annually of not more than 10 per cent of persons who can not read, said average to be computed upon the basis of the illiteracy shown in the statistics of the three fiscal years immediately preceding the year in which the educational test is applied."

Very truly, yours,
T. V. POWDERLY,
Commissioner-General.

The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has been assured by the office of the Secretary of State that the adoption of the percentage plan for the application of an educational test that I have described will not in any way involve the United States in any difficulties whatever with any other nation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS].

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, during the few years that I have had the honor to serve in this House I have, until the present session, been content to follow our leaders without raising my voice in criticism or warning with reference to the future.

I fully appreciate the danger to one who arouses the dogs of warfare by assuming to criticise the conduct of affairs upon this floor; but dangers, however great, shall not restrain me in the performance of a duty I owe to the people. I recognize the importance of harmony in the party, the necessity for party leaders, but the man who represents a constituency composed of citizens of all parties must fail in the performance of his public duty if he does not oppose party leadership when such leadership runs away from the declared principles of the party and does not conserve the welfare of the people.

When I found, not long ago, the Republican and Democratic leaders yoked together upon this floor advocating a cause in the interest of a foreign (Cuban) people which seemed most unwise for our country and detrimental to our labor and industries, with the promise of benefit to no one but the sugar trust, I was constrained to record my judgment by word and deed in opposition. On the 12th day of last March I called public attention to the most reprehensible methods used by the monopolists to create public sentiment in the interest of private greed. I endeavored to bring to the attention of the members and the people the corporate bureau known as the "United States Export Association," organized evidently for the dissemination of misinformation for the purpose of influencing legislation for the special benefit of combinations and trusts.

I was not surprised to find that the unsuspicious were heedless of the facts and deaf to the voice of warning. The clever pettifogger, F. B. Thurber, had prepared the attack upon our unsuspecting, trustful public so adroitly as to conceal the truth and make private greed seem honorable and the stealthful usurpation of a public franchise appear to be a righteous expansion of private enterprise.

This is indeed a new and most ingenious method of the trusts and monopolists to mold public sentiment, stop legislation, and secure a new and stronger clutch upon the purse strings of our Treasury, trade, and commerce.

I for one desire to brand such methods as infamous, and those who use them, whether in a righteous or unrighteous cause, are lending their influence to the profit of the devil. Public sentiment thus created is unholy and full of evil. All good deeds and laws in this life and country are founded upon a natural public sentiment. Such methods may prevail for a day, but can not endure.

An honest public sentiment does not require the aid of private enterprise or scheming pettifoggers to give it force.

The people are occupied and prosperous. They believe in a government of the people, by the people, for the people. They are watching the rapid movements of combinations and trusts for the gratification of private greed.

I hope and pray their trust in their chosen representatives may not be shaken, their confidence in the administration of public affairs may be justly continued, but I am reminded of the prophetic words of our martyred Lincoln, who said:

Beware of the money power which seeks to perpetuate its reign until the wealth of the country has passed into the hands of the few and the nation is lost.

The fierce struggles that have taken place upon this floor this session between private and public interests, the decapitation of public measures by honorable men inspired by a false public sentiment, which was created by concealed private greed under the cover of the methods of the devil, prompts me to recall the words of our immortal Lincoln as a warning for the future.

When the cable bill, after waiting on the Calendar for nearly four months, had finally forced the hand of the all-powerful and secured recognition, I will admit I was surprised to find it ignominiously gagged by the leading satellites on this floor before it had been even read.

Mr. Chairman, this is rather a hard charge, but I simply want to read the specific rule that was adopted for the consideration of that bill, the rule offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. After stating that the bill was to be considered every day after the reading of the Journal until it was disposed of, allowing no other matters to intervene, the rule as amended read as follows:

And after four hours of general debate in the Committee of the Whole the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule, and any proposition relating to ocean cables shall be considered germane thereto.

When that rule was adopted, Mr. Chairman, it disposed, so far as the Committee of the Whole was concerned, of the rules of this House. There was but one thing for the Committee of the Whole to do, and that was to take up that bill and amend it, and no amendment was proper except those with relation to ocean cables. The proposition to strike out the enacting clause was not permissible. A special rule either is of no effect whatever or it disposes of the general rules of the House. I want to call attention to the only precedent on this subject. That is a decision rendered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] in the Fifty-fifth Congress, where he held that a special rule of identically the same nature could not be defeated by a motion to strike out the enacting clause; that such a motion was not permissible under a special order of the House.

Now, I say that the cable bill was gagged unlawfully, illegally, contrary to the precedents of this House, and in the silent presence of the leaders on this floor. At that time I did not think of this ruling. My mind was occupied with the general subject of the bill. I care not now, except that had the bill been read as it was intended to be, had it been subject to the amendment with reference to cable matters only, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] would at least have been adopted, and the President of the United States would have had the power to act, and American interests would have been protected. I think it is time that other men speak out when such measures of great magnitude are ignominiously gagged. The special order provided that the bill should be considered, and that only those amendments relating to the subject of ocean cables should be germane. Therefore any other proposition was not in order.

I had anticipated bitter opposition, for I understood the motive that prompted those who wished to protect private interests in the hands of the cable monopoly. I expected opposition from those honorable gentlemen who live in holy horror of the management of public utilities by the people or any extension of the post-office facilities into the avenues of trade and commerce, but I was shocked when it was beheaded by the broadax in the hands of the Robespierre of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], for I know him to be an honorable gentleman uninfluenced by private interests. Nothing but the blind worship of his idol, the self-constituted guardian of the public Treasury, could induce him to lend the destructive influence of his broadax to the cable monopolist.

Some one has said that our Robespierre is a consistent guardian of the Treasury and wields his broadax upon all measures affecting the people's money, and refers us to his effective assault upon the forest-reserve bill, which he gleefully decapitated, to quote his own language, "just back of its ears." Also the isthmian canal bill, upon which he applied his broadax with all the power of his masterful character. But the session had then barely commenced; the measure was backed by an honest public sentiment, unaided by the artful circulating bureau of the monopolist, and the edge of the broadax was muffled by those who usually prepare the beheading block and who direct its deadly course, and our Robespierre's efforts were in vain.

While I admit his sincerity and honorable fidelity to his self-constituted guardianship, I am constrained to ask where our Robespierre was and who had possession of his broadax when that swine-like beast ran off with the plug to the public Treasury and emptied over $60,000,000 of the public funds into the rivers, harbors, and navigable highways of the country, embracing more useless appropriations than sufficient to construct two Pacific cables. Lest some one refer as a just excuse for the silence of our Robespierre and the loss of the broadax on that measure to the sledge-hammer strokes of the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] as a substitute, I will remind you that I watched with much interest the great effort of the gentleman from Iowa on that occasion, and I observed that instead of the broadax he wielded an old torch with an expiring flame and waved it so high in the air that the animal passed through without scorching a hair.

But what was the matter with our swarthy, pessimistic friend from California [Mr. LOUD]? He not only jumped upon our measure with both feet, but unwantonly thrust his black spear into the vitals of the honorable Committee on Rules by characterizing "its actions as dark and secret as the acts ever committed in the dark of the night." What direful and mysterious "dark and secret action" has he discovered hidden in the pessimistic gloom witlsin which he roams? I feel it my duty to protect our honorable Committee on Rules from such dangerous thrusts of the mysterious spear of our friend, for it was drawn in defense of the cable octopus, missed its aim at the dyspeptic wolverine, and landed in the bowels of an innocent committee of this House.

Some one should take charge of our esteemed friend from California and endeavor to extricate him from the damp, dark, and stagnant gloom which surrounds him, clouds his vision, and befogs his knowledge of ancient history. While we may be able to discover and withstand the "dark and secret acts of the Committee on Rules," we can never consent to permit him to transport the lovely Desdemona from the light and joy of Venetian history back four hundred years into the gloomy associations of the lean and hungry Cassius.

We expected to arouse his wrath. We have been made to understand his position upon the administration of the Post-Office Department. We did not suppose that his swarthy appearance indicated Indian blood, but the memory of the defeat of his Economic Postal Company's scheme by the gentleman from Michigan in the Fifty-fourth Congress, has evidently not been forgotten. We did not expect one who would voluntarily turn over the Postal Rural Free-Delivery Service to private contract could support Government ownership of a public utility.

Perhaps it may not be regarded as unfair to call his attention to the fact that the rural free-delivery patrons, farmers of this country, who are desirous of securing the benefit of such service, are to-day paying an average of $2 each for boxes that could be secured for 50 cents apiece if the honorable gentleman from California would but provide the Postmaster-General with power to supply such boxes at cost without expense to the Government.

Do you wonder that I am confounded trying to reconcile the course of legislative events?

DANGERS OF TRUSTS.

I am constrained, in consequence of the silence of the leading members of the Ways and Means Committee when the cable bill was being ignominiously gagged, to call public attention to the unjust discriminations made by the steel trust against American and in favor of foreign cable manufacturers. They may not be aware of the fact that the steel armor wire, the component part of a cable, can be purchased by foreign cable manufacturers 20 per cent less than the same material can be obtained by American cable plants.

In support of my position I submit two letters, written by the same manufacturer to the same consumer, offering to sell the steel wire for cable manufacture for export at 20 per cent less than it can be acquired in this country. The letters, with the exception of the names, are as follows:

GENTLEMEN: In response to your request we name you on Nos. 7 and 8 galvanized BB. telephone wire 4¼ cents per pound, less 2½ and 2½ per cent, delivered at Perth Amboy.

This quotation applies on an order for 60 tons, or two carloads. Terms, thirty days, or 1 per cent off for cash if paid within ten days from date of invoice.

Yours, truly, ——— ———.

GENTLEMEN: Confirming our quotation of to-day, we can sell you 200 tons of No. 8 extra BB. galvanized telegraph wire at 4¼ cents per pound, and BB. quality at 3¼ cents, burlapped in half-mile bundles, f. o. b. New York. Terms, thirty days, or 1 per cent off for cash ten days.

The above quotation is for export only. If you require the wire not burlapped, the price would be 10 cents per bundle less. This quotation only to hold good for twenty-four hours.

Yours, truly, ——— ———.

I also submit an extract from a letter written by the president of one of our large cable institutions conclusively showing the unjust discrimination against American cable industries, and I especially desire to call this to the attention of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], whose dread of Government ownership of public utilities seems to dull his zeal for American industry to the extent of permitting the only hope for the establishment of a cable plant on the Pacific coast to be destroyed.

You will see that they quoted No. 8 BB galvanized wire 3¼ cents per pound, f. o. b. New York (10 cents per bundle for burlapping does not cut any figure), and stated that "the above quotation is for export only," while the other letter quotes the same wire, identically, at 4¼ cents per pound, less 2½ and 2½ per cent, delivered at Perth Amboy.

In other words, the f. o. b. Perth Amboy price is 4.15 cents per pound, while the f. o. b. New York price "for export only" is 3.75 cents, making the home price a trifle over 20 per cent higher than the export price on identically the same material.

It was admitted that the contract price for the cable between California and Hawaii was $2,280,000. The actual cost of the material required for the construction thereof was not less than $800,000, one-half of which would embrace the cost of the steel armor wire that enters into the construction thereof, and it will be observed that the English cable plant could purchase this steel armor wire at 20 per cent less than our own cable industries. This saving, in consequence of the methods adopted by the steel trust, is equivalent to a bonus to the foreign cable manufacturer of from fifty to eighty thousand dollars on the one strand between California and Hawaii.

NO TARIFF DUTY ON CABLES.

I also desire to call the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House [Mr. PAYNE] to the ruling of the Treasury Department with reference to the collection of duty under the tariff law on this cable. He may be suprised to learn that no duty can be collected. While I do not concur in the judgment of the Treasury Department, because I hold that the territory from California to Hawaii is wholly within our jurisdiction and there is no international boundary which limits our jurisdiction to 1 marine league from shore, yet I am confronted with the ruling of the Treasury Department, and when the cable monopoly desires to lay that strand made by a foreign cable plant the Treasury Department, if it follows the rulings heretofore made and set forth in the letter which I herewith submit, will waive the payment of the duty of 35 per cent on gutta percha and 45 per cent on copper and steel wire, equivalent to nearly half a million of dollars upon this cable.

Let me have read the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject in support of my argument, and ask the members of the Ways and Means Committee to carefully consider the dangers that confront our interests. When I have presented the matter to their attention and the public, my duty has been fulfilled; the responsibility is now upon them and the executives of the nation.

While admiring the heroic efforts of our Robespierre for the protection of the public Treasury, we must not overlook the responsibility of those charged with the duty to replenish the revenues and enforce our tariff laws.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, November 20, 1901.

Hon. JOHN B. CORLISS, Detroit, Mich.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 11th instant further in the matter of the dutiability of the proposed cable across the Pacific, extending from California to Hawaii and thence to the Philippines, which matter was the subject of your letter of the 1st instant and the Department's reply thereto of the 9th instant.

You state that you desire further explanation of the last clause of the Department's letter, wherein it was stated "that only such portions of the cable of foreign production would become dutiable as are actually landed or laid within the jurisdiction of the United States. As this jurisdiction does not extend beyond 1 marine league from shore, only such portion of the cable as was actually brought or laid within that limit would be dutiable."

You state that it seems to you that such a cable, when laid, extending from California to Hawaii, connecting the territory of our own country, must be regarded as an importation of the entire cable, as that part within the 1 marine league can not be severed from the whole.

In reply to your request for further information, I have to state that the tariff laws of the United States do not become operative until merchandise is brought within the jurisdiction of the United States; that is, within 1 marine league from shore. Therefore, should a vessel specially fitted out for the laying of the ocean cable begin operations at a point, say, just beyond 1 marine league from shore, and should there anchor, or otherwise securely fasten one end of the ocean cable, to be subsequently joined to the shore end, there is no way by which the laying of the cable across the Pacific Ocean to a distance of, say, just beyond 1 marine league from the shore of Hawaii, where the end could be anchored or securely fastened in like manner as before, can be interfered with for the purpose of assessing duty. It is only when the shore ends are to be attached, and for that purpose must necessarily be brought within the jurisdiction of the United States, that the tariff laws become operative, and for that reason duties on shore ends accrue and are collected by the proper customs authorities.

Respectfully,

H. A. TAYLOR,
Assistant Secretary.

DEMOCRACY ON TRUSTS.

I was astonished the other day to hear the Democratic leader on this floor, the honorable gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], state that—the factor in American affairs at this time most dangerous to our institutions and threatening to their permanency is the trusts. * * * That they are a factor to be feared and one that imperatively demands the strong hand of the Federal Government, for control can not be denied, but must be apparent to all persons—

And charge that the Republican Administration, Senate, and House of Representatives must be held responsible for the extension of the trusts' power and the enactment of laws for their proper control.

We are familiar with such Democratic wails and vituperations. Ordinarily I would pass them by as unworthy of consideration, but the opportunity to call attention to the acts of the Democratic leader and his cohorts on the minority side of this House in supporting one of the greatest trusts, combinations, and monopolies of the world in its effort to steal a public utility is too fresh in the minds of the members upon this floor to permit such slanderous charges to remain unchallenged.

The RECORD shows that of the members who voted to decapitate the cable bill and permit the cable monopoly to fasten its tentacles upon the arteries of trade and commerce of our country 62 were Democrats, with the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] boldly in the lead, and with the exception of the Robespierre of the House and my pessimistic friend from California made all of the arguments in support of the cable trust; and of the 77 members who voted for the people there were only 15 patriotic Democrats who had the courage to stand up for the people.

"Actions speak louder than words." "Wherefore, by their fruits ye shall know them."

I am aware that the criticisms which I have assumed to make will be looked upon as the natural utterances of one who has met disaster with an important public measure in which he felt the deepest interest.

While defeated, I have the satisfaction of knowing that through my efforts the Government has been saved from the burden of a subsidy, the purposes of the cable monopoly clearly shown and now well understood by the people, that the Executives of our country can protect our interests by assuming to exercise the inherent power held by the nation over public utilities and international communication.

I feel amply rewarded for my efforts in behalf of the cable bill, as expressed by an editorial that was published in the leading independent newspaper of my State, which I desire to print with my remarks, as it is an impartial, disinterested recognition of the service rendered upon this important public question.

[The Evening News, Thursday, June 12.]

DEFEAT WITH HONOR.

Congressman CORLISS has met the enemy of the Government cable project very much as a man meets a dead wall. He can get up and brush the dust off his clothes without experiencing the pangs of total defeat. His main purpose failed. It was doomed from the first. The Government is still too "weak" to cope with giant monopolies that oppose Government ownership of utilities. In one particular Mr. CORLISS stands a winner, and so there is victory even in his defeat.

When he proposed a Government cable across the Pacific an organized lobby was demanding a big subsidy for a private cable. Had there been no bill for a Government cable, it is quite probable that the subsidy scheme might have carried. CORLISS put up such a persistent fight and made such a showing of facts that the private corporation was compelled to change front. It abandoned its plea for a subsidy, and offered to lay the cable with its own money and to give the Government a special rate if it would keep out of the telegraph business. This surrender defeated the Government cable, but a fair referee must decide that honors are easy if the corporation does get the gate money.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, before the war with Spain, American history was a glorious encouragement to independence throughout the world, without a page approving the doctrines of tyrants. The makers of that history sometimes differed, but never on the fundamental principles of liberty. Once we were under the then mildest despotism in all the world, administered by men of our race, by a government of our kindred, which had every inducement to deal justly and rule us for our good.

We grew strong; we prospered under it. England professed to rule us for our benefit and to grant the colonies every liberty to which they were entitled. Had our ancestors entertained the views of the Republican party to-day, the Declaration of Independence would have been unwritten, and European monarchies would now control America from Labrador to Patagonia. But lust of power and greed of plunder did not blind them to the wrongs of foreign sovereignty or the right inherent in separate communities.

Patriots wrote the Declaration. In all profane literature it is the most blessed message yet published to mankind—a charter of human rights fit for every age, land, and people, without the doubtful language of fear, the falsehood of hypocrisy, the injustice of greed, or the favoritism of selfishness. Timeservers denounced it as incendiary, but brave and honest men proclaimed it true, and by sacrifice and blood established it as a heritage to freemen. Under it the Republic grew great and made the Pacific our western boundary, conferring its blessings upon every man in all that vast domain and giving to him the Constitution of our fathers.

Following its teachings, the people that gave to us Lafayette, amidst convulsions that shocked civilization, slew its king and, in the name of liberty, equality, and fraternity, assumed the form of a republic. Mexico and the South American states looked northward, and, inspired by its fruits, one by one broke the rule of kings and became self-governing commonwealths. The continents had no corners where it did not inspire mankind. Away off beyond the equator, across the seas, little bands of men, in form, in right, in religion, in aspiration, such as we, established themselves into two republics, fashioned after ours, built upon the same doctrines, to preserve to themselves and their children the blessings of liberty.

That imperial power which denied the truth of the Declaration of Independence and by force endeavored to destroy it, proud through generations of colonialism, stronger than when our ancestors drove it from these beloved shores, by pillage and plunder and death, though at "a cost that staggered humanity," has at last destroyed their independence, and has decreed as effectually as one generation can decree that republics shall not exist in South Africa.

The business in the Philippines in which our Government is unfortunately engaged may forbid the official expression of sympathy, and the party feeling of Republicans may repress in them the sentiments of regret at the fate of the Dutch Republics, but there is no business and no condition that can prevent the free, courageous citizens of America, who would fortify virtue and strengthen liberty throughout the world and who hope that the blessings of popular government will some day protect the rights of all mankind, from shedding a tear of sorrow that the Boers were unable to survive the terrors of British power.

Mr. Chairman, darkness can not exist with light, error with truth, nor wrong with right. Our liberty can not exist with the tenets of kings. The principles of free government can not exist with imperialism. Both can not survive. We to-day confront the issue.

What shall our conduct be? Shall we indorse or abandon the solemn adherence of our ancestors to the undying rights of individuals and communities? Shall we approve or protest against the imperial doctrine that permits one community to rule another against its consent? Shall we uphold or reproach the best principle known to humanity in all its social relations—that of local self-government? Shall we commend or accuse that tenet of cruel tyranny that taxes a people without representation? Shall we denounce or embrace the hated policy of colonialism which our forefathers impeached as a crime for whatever purposes pursued or by whomsoever administered?

Mr. Chairman, the settlement of the Philippine problem will in large part determine our destiny. We still have the power to effect that settlement for the benefit of mankind or to permit its settlement to the hurt and injury of the remotest generations. The noise of war and the excitement of victory over Spain have perhaps so far subsided as to allow us to exercise manly, candid, patriotic consideration of the difficulty confronting us and our posterity.

I shall not by wholesale condemn the men responsible for the present situation nor indulge in bitter criticism of the wrongs committed by the Administration against the cherished ideals and best sentiments of our people. I utter no malice against those who have violated the spirit and the principles of the American bill of rights. The subject is too serious, the results too vital, for bitterness and spite. Some have doubtless earned by selfish and partisan advocacy of matters subversive of our principles the indignation and scorn of brave, high-minded men, but indignation and scorn, however just and righteous, do not convince men nor render the problem easier.

I believe it is better and hope it is fairer to those who shaped the policy our country has pursued for three and a half years to admit their honesty and patriotism and attribute their errors and mistakes to the weakness of human nature when power tempted their ambition and circumstances flattered their vanity and to lament that their moral convictions were not strong enough to resist these seductions. The historian will contrast the position of the Administration with the policy of our country uniformly pursued from its beginning to the Spanish war and search in vain for sound reasons for the departure from our ancient faith.

His charity may discourage a conclusion that plunder and greed, or a desire to subserve the demands of trusts, or a longing to obtain other men's land or to destroy other men's rights were the controlling influences around the Administration in these days. In kindness he may say the hot fever of war glory alone produced that condition of the mind which heard the whisperings of tyranny without rebuke and yielded without remorse. Reared in security amid the blessings of free institutions, they enjoyed what they did not appreciate—the right of men to popular government. With the fever on them they seized an opportunity which they imagined never came to their predecessors, and which, had it come, would have been promptly and proudly rejected—the opportunity of ruling a distant and strange people and establishing for us the dangers and wrongs of colonialism.

The historian will write that the acquisition of the Philippines was neither the necessary nor the natural result of the war with Spain for the freedom of Cuba, and that the war in the Philippines resulted from our needless aggression against a people whose civilization can not elevate, whose power can not protect, and whose resources and commerce can not enrich us. I have now neither the time nor the inclination to discuss why or how the trouble arose. We have the Philippines, we have the trouble. The question is, What shall be done?

What course shall we pursue about them? In endeavoring to set forth briefly the course which appears wise, just, and right, I shall perhaps make observations with which partisan Republicans may not now agree, but with which I hope the sober judgment of American patriots who are not personally charged with responsibility to defend the present policy will accord.

The course that I advocate leads to the independence of the Philippine people as a self-governing republic and to the independence of the American people from the cruelties, corruptions, burdens, wrongs, and dangers of colonialism.

Mr. Chairman, be it known to all men that unless the American people speak their sentiments at the polls and uphold their manhood and conscience and require a change on the part of their Government the present policy will continue. True, the Republican party has not taken the people into its confidence and defined its policy in reference to the Philippines, and we know the purposes of the dominant party only from its conduct in the islands, from the bill now pending, and from occasional outbursts from Administration sources of strenuous references to the flag's staying "put"—references which are usually more in keeping with the character of bullies and braggarts than of good men or statesmen. The Administration's policy will deny them independence and commit us to colonialism. Unless the people are willing to sacrifice the moral influences of this Republic, change its essential political doctrines, and adopt the creed of kings, they should speak in accents strong and clear against the Administration.

Mr. Chairman, I know of but one test to apply to matters arising for my consideration, and the great masses of the people desire their representatives to apply that test to all matters. That test is not "Will it pay?" not "Are we in it?" not "Can we do it?" not "Who opposes it?" not "Who favors it?" but the simple, plain question, "Is it right?"

Mr. Chairman, in all ages there have been conflicts in the theories of government. Some believe that it is unsafe to allow the people to have part in the governing business, and that it is prudent and wise to confine participation in government to a few. This belief creates oligarchies, monarchies, and absolutism, and princes, emperors, kings, lords, dukes, and other titles are common to that idea. Others believe that the people who are to be governed are capable of providing for themselves a proper government, and that it is prudent and wise to permit the people to share in the governing business. This belief makes the pure democracies and republics, and in them there are no emperors, or kings, or dukes.

Both these beliefs, resulting in separate systems of government, have, with varying success, secured peace, happiness, and prosperity to those governed. If all in authority were perfect in mind, in conscience, in every good quality, it would hardly pay to discuss the differences between a republic and a monarchy, but all men are imperfect, and it is important that mankind shall have that form of government which will be of the greatest benefit to it in its imperfection.

A monarchy and a republic can not have equal merit. Both can not be right. In one system the theory is that all governmental power resides in and belongs to a few—originally in the nobility, in the royal family, with the king as its head—and whatever share the people have they have not by right, but by the grace of that respected class. In the other system the theory is that all power resides in and belongs to the people, and whatever power congresses, governors, judges, generals, or presidents have is by the will and consent of the people.

In every republic there are some who believe in the other system, and in every monarchy there are those who believe in the people's theory. This has resulted usually in every monarchy having in it many of the characteristics of republics, and sometimes in a republic having tendencies to monarchic powers. The belief in the right of the people governed to provide the form and machinery of their government and define its duties and powers is the great American doctrine. The monarchic or imperial theory permits not only the few to govern the many, but it permits one state or community to govern the people of a separate state or community.

The American theory does not permit it. The right of self-government requires local self-government. It is the great essential of liberty and progress. Kings and emperors have denied this right and by force have for centuries repressed it where they could. Under the government of others people have been plundered in every age. Whenever one community governs another it is despotism. It is tyranny for a people on one side of the sea to rule a people on the other side without their intelligent and free consent, and the Creator has so made man that he will not intelligently and freely consent for another people to rule his people. No people has yet been created that loved not liberty, and happy it is for the world that all intelligent people resist tyranny.

An all-wise God made the earth and divided it by oceans, ridged it with mountains, and belted it with varying climates, and the races of mankind He made and to each of them He gave a fitting country. No people has yet welcomed the friendly invader of another race, and each has resisted the approach of those who sought its land or its freedom. This spirit is as universal as the belief in a future state, so universal that we believe God gave it to all His reasoning creatures. Those who violate the laws of nature are wicked and those who violate the rights of people are tyrants. Reason and justice, nature and experience, pronounce self-government a sound and safe doctrine. The United States four years ago proclaimed it true when we declared "that the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent."

No body of men could be found under our flag to deny that the people of Cuba of right ought to be independent. Cuba was separated from other States by nature's barriers. Her people desired to be free. They fought to be free. They deserved to be free and independent. The Cubans have no greater rights than others similarly situated. The policy of the Republican party forbids the American people to repeat their former proclamation, forbids them to say that 10,000,000 of people 7,000 miles away from us, whom Admiral Dewey declared were more intelligent and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, ought to be free and independent.

Heretofore in every struggle for independence on either hemisphere success filled every American heart with joy and every failure produced regret. Can a policy which paralyzes American sympathy for liberty be right? Mr. Chairman, suppose when we were preparing to drive Spain from America and establish independent Cuba some one had risen in his place in this House and to all the world charged that the Administration would take the Philippines, would overrun them with soldiers, would extend to them no hope of independence, would require an increase in the Regular Army, would require enormous increases in annual expenses, would put us in such a position that we could not speak for liberty throughout the world, would cause us to enter upon colonialism, would have us to bear the humiliation of torture and cruelty committed in our name upon those people, what would have been the reply to such a member?

You would have denounced him as a wild dreamer, a false prophet, and a slanderer. Your papers would have exceeded you in denunciation. You would have invoked the glories of 1776 and the Constitution of our country. You would have appealed to the best sentiments of our nature and to the purest impulses of America to convince us that such things could never occur in the land where Jefferson, and Washington, and Webster, and Calhoun's memories survive. You would have persuaded us that you were only going to break the imperial grasp of Spain on Cuba and thus give another people the rights of liberty. Can a policy be right that will compel this country to hold an imperial grasp upon the Philippines?

Instead of the policy of the Administration, the Democratic party, in accordance with American traditions and principles, in the name of right and eternal justice, believing that it is wrong to hold the Philippines as a subject people and that it is unwise to admit them as a part of our Union with many Senators and 50 Representatives in this Congress to help govern us, proposes for this country to declare that a stable government shall be established and the people under the name of the Philippine Republic be given independence.

What a glory, my countrymen, that would be! Heretofore our example has inspired the establishment of republics on other continents. Here let our action release one. Let it be not said that America holds chains upon a people. Mr. Chairman, is it not better for our country to continue a career as a great people who have established republics, who have inspired republics, who have promoted throughout the world the universal hope of political freedom, than to mar the best pages of our history and join the ranks of the republic crushers and hope destroyers? Let the free men of America realize that our Government is their agent, and that they are morally responsible for the deeds of their Government unless they promptly repudiate them, a responsibility which they can not, if they would, avoid.

Let the people understand that the powers of imperialism and the denial of independence are just as wrong, just as despotic, just as mischievous, when exercised by our Government over a distant people as when exercised by the monarchies of Europe over a distant people. That we are the perpetrators of iniquity does not change its character. In the sight of the Almighty God and in the judgment of good men we have no special dispensation to relieve us from the criminality of wrongdoing. God never gave the right of liberty to one people and gave them the right to destroy the liberty of another people. [Applause.]

Can brave, noble men, with clear consciences and good hearts, deliberately deny to other communities the rights and privileges which they demand for theirs? Has the golden rule no application among States and statesmen? Is it right to continue a policy that would abrogate the Divine injunction, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so unto them?" Such a policy can not be right.

Mr. Chairman, an impartial man, whose vision is clear, can see in the arguments against the Administration's policy the dearest principles of society—honesty, not robbery; brotherhood, not tyranny; candor, not hypocrisy; liberty, not despotism. We are clothed in the armor our fathers wore, and the weapons they used against the foes of America's independence are our weapons. We drink without fear from the fountains of democratic institutions, and would extend their waters to others, knowing they have blessed ourselves.

We embrace in our arms the Declaration of Independence and stand hopefully beneath our Constitution, using no disinfectants to preserve us from the contact, while those who defend the policy of the Administration resort to unholy methods to limit the spread of their contagion. Shades of our 1776 heroes, what a spectacle is presented to you when an American statesman avoids the principles of your revolution in discussing questions of importance to mankind! The sober judgment of your descendants will condemn the position of those who apologize for your immortal declaration and who ignore its plain meaning for selfish and partisan ends.

But, Mr. Chairman, they say we have become a "world power;" and the intimation is that if we are a "world power" the rules of right and conscience are no longer useful to us. Does power corrupt and never purify and elevate? A "world power!" Forgetting that if we are to abandon those essentials that make us a "world power," we shall no longer be worthy to remain one. Dewey's victory at Manila and Schley's at Santiago were because of the element of liberty and patriotism instilled into us by our predecessors.

We never rumbled our artillery, we never flashed a sword, we never marched on an army, we never fired a cannon in South America, yet we were a world power when Brazil, Argentina, and Bolivia became Republics under our influence. Nineteen Republics on the Western Hemisphere stand erect in liberty to-day to attest the fact that we were a world power long before the thought of colonialism ever touched an American President. We are a world power not on account of but in spite of the Philippines; but never again in all the ages will we have the influence for freedom in the world we heretofore enjoyed until the flag of the Philippine republic, raised by our consent, is saluted by our cannon.

But they say it may be that we have sacrificed our principles, but we have sacrificed them for the Filipinos; we rule them for their benefit; we deny them independence that they may rejoice in our liberty; we destroy their people that they may enjoy our benevolent assimilation; our general has ordered a province to be made a howling wilderness for their sake; we have established concentration camps to bless them; we torture them to impress our Christian civilization; we burn their homes and devastate their lands for their good. All this we do that they may be happy and contented.

Spain—cruel, despotic, and selfish Spain—did all this in Cuba and the Philippines for the sake of Spain and Spanish interests; but we, they say, do all this for the interest of those we outrage and plunder and kill. Mr. Chairman, are we a nation of hypocrites? Will the American people permit this country to be written down in history as a false pretender? Will they consent to have it entered upon the balance sheet of eternity among blood-stained conquerors as a robber? Ah! We are able to subdue the last aspiring Filipino. We can make a peace so universal that the laughter of a child will never there be heard again. We can pacify them till not a native shall respect or fear our flag. We have the power, the courage, the means to conquer them till protest shall be silenced. Our policy appeals to fear, not love.

Tyranny may give peace and quiet; but peace and quiet are poor compensations for the loss of freedom and hope. Despotism can not secure national happiness. We may circumscribe them with liberty by means of our Army, the liberty that we think them entitled to enjoy, the liberty we think will bless them. But liberty imposed can not satisfy. Liberty imposed is not liberty. The wild bird caged longs for nature's freedom, and though you feed and shelter him, he beats his wings against his prison sides, for the "liberty" of his cage is tyranny.

Why, Mr. Chairman, those people are ten millions in number—three times more numerous than we were when Yorktown was fought. They have a territory as large as Japan or Italy; larger than England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales together; larger than Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Maryland combined; larger than all New England, New York, New Jersey, and Delaware. They have churches and colleges.

Their chief town, Manila, is as large as this city of Washington. They have farmers, mechanics, merchants and bankers, scientists, doctors, preachers, lawyers, judges. They have much education, so much that our Government has employed over 4,000 native Filipino teachers in the public schools. The Filipinos have homes; there are husbands and wives whose lives are gladdened by the prattle of little children. They love their kindred, their homes, their country. They are human beings endowed with certain inalienable rights, such as you and I claim. They have human sympathies, human feelings of pride and resentment.

They have aspirations such as our fathers had. They have the motives and the feelings of resistance just as we have. They are our fellow-mortals. They have read the Declaration of Independence, and, more, they have believed it. Are such people to be denied the right of a national existence, and have that denial from Washington's country? How often have I rejoiced at the everlasting desire of Irishmen for a separate national existence, and hoped with them for final success. Republicans, how can you censure any American citizen for desiring to see the Filipinos have an independent national existence? Hope is their offense. Can any good man in America denounce as a crime a people's hope for independence?

Mr. Chairman, aside from the Filipinos, the American taxpayer has rights. Every citizen is entitled to peaceful conditions, to low taxes, and to require his Government to be just and do right. The Philippine Islands as a permanent colony of the United States will probably require a large army, and will for generations probably now and then break out in insurrection against our authority and require the blood and anguish of this land to put it down. A people's desire for liberty once aroused never abates. The Philippines have already cost us $600,000,000, which is about $50 for each family in the United States, and thousands of lives, and the end is not yet. The Navy and Army will require vast sums of money every year on their account.

Five years ago our Army cost about $25,000,000 a year; now about $100,000,000. Then our Navy cost about $30,000,000; now about $80,000,000 a year. Our pensions will cost many millions a year for the next fifty years on their account. Our children and theirs will feel these great burdens severely.

Imperialism is a costly wrong, even on those who exercise it. There is one thing sure, unless the people consider these vast burdens of taxation and expenses and rebuke the party responsible for them they will not diminish.

If we could to-day have the Philippine republic enter the ranks of independent nations, with prudent and proper reductions the taxpayers of our country would save more than $100,000,000 a year, or several times our entire trade with those islands. Is it right to continue a policy that will cost our people, for whose benefit alone our Government exists, many millions of dollars a year, and which will give the great body of the people absolutely no benefit in return? Is it even possible that the Republican party, supported as it is by the great trusts of the land, can convince the people that such policy is right?

Mr. Chairman, the wishes of the good men of this country, who devote their energies to quiet life, are entitled to as much respect by our Government as are the wishes of those devoted to schemes of great exploitation and conscienceless commercialism, or whose fortunes are cast with our Army and Navy. It is not difficult to find some reason for the advocacy of the Republican policy by certain classes of our citizenship without impugning their patriotism except by comparison with other sentiments. It is natural for officers in the Army and Navy to approve conditions which furnish them service, render promotions more numerous and rapid, and enlarge in public esteem their occupation.

We understand how those who make fortunes by contracts with the Government for coal, ships, guns, powder, provisions, clothing, and a thousand other things can favor a continuation of a policy which they probably advised, and which puts money in their pockets.

We understand why stockholders in great syndicates engaged in exploiting the natural resources of those islands, and in getting valuable franchises for public service functions to enable them to collect large dividends from the inhabitants, who believe there is "money in it" for them, insist that no change shall be made in a policy which probably they advised.

It requires no peculiar ability to comprehend the reason which prompts Republican postmasters and papers whose editors or owners have political patronage or places under the Administration, internal-revenue officers, and others who or whose close kindred by the grace of the Republican party draw salaries from the Federal Treasury, and others in office representing the Republican party or candidates for its honors, to stand by the policy maintained by the Administration—the Administration which has not the moral power or the original purpose to resist the wishes of the classes first named.

All these, Mr. Chairman, are ready to defend the policy now in force at all points, to deny the best-established facts, and when not denied to justify the most terrible wrongs, and to attempt by countercharges to distract the minds of good men from the real situation. The classes I have named and their close friends, in my opinion, constitute the greater part of the strength of the present policy. Few others heartily approve it, yet among them are good men, some ministers of the gospel, even forgetting, it seems, the holy precepts of their own religion and the gentle method of its propagation in a devouring zeal for theirs, justify the policy which they trust will result in weakening, if not destroying, the domination of that religion they most greatly fear.

But, sirs, the great majority of the good men of this land, who have "no ax to grind," no especial interests to serve, who love their fellow-men and serve justice and truth, of the lawyers, the editors, the doctors, the merchants, the manufacturers, the farmers, the mechanics, the laborers, the preachers, the teachers, and others engaged in honest private toil, are, in my judgment, in favor of liberty throughout the world, are against the present Philippine policy, and against its resulting cruelties, burdens, tendencies, and dangers. If, realizing its importance, they will fearlessly and candidly express themselves, the problem will soon be solved in the best interests of all concerned, except the military folks, the Army contractors, the exploiters, and Republican office-holders and office hopers.

The present policy may profit a few, but never in all this world will it help to the extent of one solitary cent the humble, plain men of America—the great masses of our country—who bear its burdens, except that here and there a widow or aged man will draw a pension for some loved one's death.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few things about the cruelties which have been committed by our agents under our flag, and which were unrebuked by the Administration until Democratic speeches and publications riveted the attention of all upon them. It is not my purpose to mention all the barbarities connected with our conduct in the Philippines; the public has already become fully acquainted with some of them of which knowledge has reached our country.

Nothing in all the range of warfare can surpass the heartlessness of the shooting of every Filipino found within 150 yards of a telegraph pole, or of our General Bell's order that "neutrality should not be tolerated," and that no person should be considered loyal simply because he does nothing against us and "takes the oath of allegiance." He must denounce and betray his countrymen and his kindred to escape General Bell's hostility. Living quietly and working peacefully the land of his ancestors for his loved ones' sake, though swearing allegiance to us, is disloyalty under that inhuman order. Our General Smith's order "to kill all over 10 years of age," desiring no prisoners, burn their homes, and "make Samar a howling wilderness" is as atrocious and beastly as any edict that ever cursed humanity in its darkest periods. How terrible is war against a people's liberty, when the representatives of Christian civilization can promulgate such heaven-shocking savagery! The annals of man's butchery of man contain nothing more awful in its ferocity.

It is painful to recall the instances of transgression against the laws of God and man committed for us in those distant islands; but unless we recall them how shall the people understand what their agents have done? Those agents have laid waste fruitful lands and burned populous towns; they have slain noncombatants and put to death prisoners in their care. These have they committed under our flag. Our fellow-citizens have read in histories and heard from their fathers of laying waste lands, burning towns, shooting with guns, and slaying with swords. But it has been reserved for these times to teach them of new tortures—tortures which Senator HOAR declared have never before been used by English-speaking people against their enemies.

The horrible "water cure," which is described in Private Weir's letter, which I ask to have printed, together with Captain West's report, has been administered to Filipinos to extort from them treachery to their friends, and the more horrible flesh twisting and tearing torture has been performed to compel from them the secrets of their fellows! Excruciating horrors! Brave, humane, honorable, Christian Americans, shall such heartrending, heartsickening deeds be charged to the wicked depravity of a few privates and fewer officers as the necessary outcroppings of man's sinful nature, or will you charge a part of it to that policy of aggression, adopted without your consent and followed without your approval, against a people who want independence and who never denied you citizenship, never taxed your business interests, never searched your ships, never violated a treaty with you, never threatened to invade your country, never disputed your boundary, nor did any other thing for which nations go to war? Will you charge these cruelties alone to the miserable individuals who perpetrated them, or will you not assume some of the responsibility for allowing your Government to continue a policy which created the conditions under which human nature has so fearfully sinned?

Mr. Chairman, ordinarily in civilized warfare about three or four and occasionally five times as many men are wounded as are killed. That has been the proportion among our soldiers in the Philippines. The proportion among the Filipinos has often been four times as many killed as wounded and sometimes ten times as many killed as wounded. No mind can conceive and no heart appreciate the tragedies concealed in those startling proportions. God pity the men who kill or torture wounded and captured enemies and make needless anguish for widows and orphans, and God pity those who justify or palliate such inhumanity.

So widespread has the spirit of cruelty become among our officials that in court-martial trials for some offenses I have named acquittals have resulted almost as of course. When right is ignored, civilization so soon degrades that officers heretofore kind hearted and humane have performed or approved deeds of startling depravity. Permit me to leave this harrowing phase of our conduct across the Pacific, which has been an offense not only to the Filipinos but to ourselves, our Army, our people, and all humanity, and which can not be justified by reciting the savage deeds or recalling the bitter prejudices of either side during the civil war between our States.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that every clear-thinking man must believe that we are engaged in a business that is wrong and that we ought to get out of it as soon as a stable government can be established there and ought to let the people of those islands know that we are willing for them to assume an independent station among the nations of the earth and work out their own destiny as to them shall seem best. Sirs, the Republican party must believe that, but finding itself in an embarrassing position it has not the moral courage to take a manly way out of it, but remains in it, cringing before the Shylocks and gold hunters. It is not power, nor force, nor judgment that is lacking, but it is moral sentiment and moral courage. In order to do right the Administration needs the command of the people.

However plain may be its duty to change its course, it will not, except under compulsion by the American voters. The Administration has wonderful pride of opinion and of position, but not the strong sense of right sufficient to enable it to adopt a better opinion or take a better position in the face of temporary humiliation which may attach to the change. The noblest, manliest thing a mortal man can do is to change from the wrong to the right. Will the American people permit a continuation of the present Philippine policy out of respect to the false pride of the Administration, or will they require that their wishes and their judgment, calm, clear, and pure, be pursued by their Government?

Mr. Chairman, we can hold those islands and survive. We can take their lands and goods and still eat, drink, and be merry. We can year after year send noble young men from this country to take the places of those who fall in battle or succumb to the diseases of that torrid climate. We can maintain an army there sufficient for any purpose. We can tax the American people far more than they have ever felt for the luxury of the sin of imperialism. We can magnify the fighting arm of the Government at the expense of peaceful ideas. We can do all this and more, and yet possibly escape for some generations the fate of other nations that sinned, but even then we would no longer be the country our fathers bequeathed to us.

Ponce de Leon searched in vain in the tangled wilds of Florida for the fountain of perpetual youth for men. Our fathers searched amid the mingled doctrines of all nations of every age and the principles of all hearts for such a fountain for government, and found it, we believe, springing from the mountain side of everlasting right in a government of the people, for the people, by the people, and as a never-failing guide to its waters they established the Declaration of Independence. Most nations die as most men die—from internal causes. We might oppress the Filipinos forever; we might destroy their 10,000,000 people and annihilate every product of their hands, so that no evidence of them should remain on earth; we might sacrifice 10,000 American men annually over there and pay out $200,000,000 annually in the business without necessarily destroying the American Republic. That is possible only in the event that it had no resultant effect here. In order to fatally harm us it must affect us internally with a malignant disorder.

The gradual loss of money and blood would weaken us, but the worst would not be the loss of money and blood. Those who plunder there would plunder here; those who wish to rule the Filipinos against their consent will wish to rule us against our consent; cruelty there will result in cruelty here; despotism there will mean despotism here; contempt for human life there will mean contempt for it here; those who will deny liberty to them may deny it to us; to magnify the army there is to magnify it here; a man who will steal there will steal here; the spirit of plunder, despotism, and cruelty will pervade our Government in its relations to us and our children if it pervades it in its relations to others.

So these resultant effects of a colonial policy I fear will be the poison that will in the years to come destroy our children's liberty and inflict upon them by slow processes a tyrannical government, in which the great trust magnates of the future shall more boldly oppress the people under a form of government in which they will be the privileged class, and whose source of strength will be not in the love and respect of the people, but in the power and dread of the armed soldiery and glittering steel.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing that more plainly demonstrates to us the consciousness of wrong on the part of the Administration and its defenders than its methods of reply to our arguments. We mention cruelty, against which every true soldier revolts, and they pretend that we attack the Army. We would preserve the honor of our Army by having its torturers and criminals punished and dismissed in disgrace and having its conduct honorable, but when we condemn the atrocities of heartless officers and men under our flag, they pretend to regard it as an assault upon the entire Army.

They can not deceive others by their false pretenses. They know that we honor the Army, rejoice in its victories, sustain it wherever it goes, and constantly vote it supplies, but we will not disgrace ourselves by approving the crimes committed by its members in our name. They would have us keep silent, deny ourselves the freedom of speech so essential to justice and to liberty, and have the people to remain in ignorance of much which has been done for them in the Philippines. They criticise those of us who look the facts squarely in the face and speak boldly about them. They have even spoken of hostility to our Army and even hinted at disloyalty, but they will learn that contemptible criticism of free speech, false charges, and bitter calumny against those of us who believe in American principles, in truth, in right, in liberty to all mankind, can neither intimidate us, deceive the people, nor strengthen their own position.

The people I have the honor to represent want to know the truth at any cost. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." The Administration and its policy are not so far above the people as to be exempt from their vigilance and criticism. Our people have never recognized the tyrant's claim that "the king can do no wrong." It was a despot, Louis XIV, who exclaimed, "I am the State; my enemies are the enemies of France." A free people's executive has never arrogated to itself the incarnation of righteousness or regarded the criticism of the people as disloyal. In all governments there is a tendency to usurp powers and privileges, but never before has the executive department of a republic deemed censure of itself as hostility to the people.

Another evidence of weakness of their position is the constant endeavor on their part to shift the responsibility of their policy from themselves to Providence, and sometimes they seem to think it unassailable if supported by the assertion that it was the policy of our late assassinated President. Throughout all ages hypocrits knowing the deep religious feeling of good men have ever sought to enlist the favor of the people for measures they could not otherwise defend by declaring that Providence had the matter in charge. Usually the manifestations of Providence are not in the exclusive visions of the powerful or discernible only to aggressors.

The afflicted, the weak, the downtrodden, the meek and lowly have fortunately been blessed with the power to know the presence of Providence. I would expect Providence to be on the side of suffering humanity praying for deliverance, on the side of struggling liberty begging for existence, on the side of appealing justice pleading for sympathy, and not always on the side of greed and pomp, of power and oppression, or as a great conqueror claimed, "on the side of the heaviest artillery." For one, as a believer in the Bible and in the holy doctrines of Jesus of Nazareth, I deny that the Administration has produced any satisfactory reason for proclaiming that their policy is under the guidance of Providence.

Instead of appealing to facts, of adducing argument, of reciting the Declaration of Independence, of speaking of man's natural rights and of his love of liberty, of man's universal brotherhood, and other matters that ennoble and convince, the Administration itself has resorted to the acts of the demagogue and pettifogger. It has denounced the policy of the Democracy as "snarling criticism." This was to arouse the prejudice of its partisans without enlightening their understanding. It is the method of error writhing under the lashings of truth, and is evidence of despair as they face the people in the ensuing campaign. But, sirs, if the Secretary of the Navy has spoken of "snarling criticism," the President himself has, perhaps for the same purposes, and certainly as an evidence of the same weakness in argument to support his policy, more widely transgressed the rules of reason and debate.

On a great occasion, in a place dedicated to the memory of heroes, around which the tenderest and most patriotic sentiments cluster, President Roosevelt, in a memorial address, took occasion to endeavor by references to lynching in the United States to either distract attention from the cruelties practiced in the Philippines or to unjustly criticise those who have spoken about them, or both, while at the same moment he declared that these lynchings are no excuse for such cruelties. It is hard to understand the partisan mind that can compare a Filipino, killed or tortured because he wants his country to be free, and a brute lynched because he assaults a woman's virtue. Did any other official of such dignity in all the world ever resort to such speech?

He told the old veterans of the Union Army gathered there before him that those who "foully slandered" them in the civil war "had their heirs to-day in those who traduce our armies in the Philippines." It is remarkable that the President, a generation removed from the civil war, whose duty is to create a spirit of fraternity throughout our land, should revive its bitter memories, and in his imagination conceive traducers in order to silence criticism of his indefensible Philippine policy. It is hard to believe that such speeches will strengthen him in any section of the country, but probably he thought so, and I admit his right to look out for his political future. Such speeches are not made for that section of the country where it is safe to rely upon offices to gather the entire strength of his party, and both sections may be of use to him hereafter. He failed to specify a single instance of slander or traduction of our army in the Philippines. A man of straw he made and attacked with strenuous vigor. To such straits are the defenders of colonialism driven.

Mr. Chairman, the people will have the facts. Power and place and intimidation can not limit their minds or bind their consciences. Free speech may be criticised and honest patriots may be denounced, but our countrymen will think, they will consider well what touches them and their posterity, they will reason as free men about it, and fear can not divert their hearts from striving after what is pure and fair and just and right.

I believe there is a spirit of universal right that binds together the good deeds and worthy enterprises of the world, that inspires noble conduct and virtuous living among men, that resists vice in private and corruption in public life, that lifts up the fallen and protects the weak, that cheers the upright and confounds the wicked, that creates liberty and destroys tyranny, that engenders hope, and honor, and sympathy, and love, and teaches all mankind to reverence the mercy and goodness and wisdom of Almighty God.

In solving this Philippine problem we appeal to the intelligence of the American people to discern this spirit of right and to their consciences to sustain it. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall append to my remarks some publications.

APPENDIX No. 1.

PRIVATE WEIR'S LETTER.

BALAYAN, BATANGAS PROVINCE, LUZON, P. I., April 10, 1901.

MY DEAR UNCLE: You are a free American citizen, and as such you are entitled to know how our government is carried on. I have something to inform you about. It is the terrible cruelty practiced upon Filipino prisoners by American soldiers in these islands. First, I want to know if the Constitution of the United States and international law does not prohibit torture.

We soldiers are representatives of a civilized nation sent out to these islands to "civilize" a so-called lot of savages. These people are not nearly so uncivilized as is supposed. You probably have read about some of our men being put to death by horrible torture, but what can you expect when we do equally as bad to our prisoners?

Has any court the right to force any prisoner to confess, no matter how many crimes the prisoner is supposed to have committed? When I say force I mean to force by torture. The Army of the United States in the Philippines is representing the law of the United States. But whether or not it is proper to torture a man it is done anyway, and under the orders of commissioned officers.

I have heard men of other regiments make their boasts of how they have made captured insurgents tell where their arms were, but never witnessed the torture but once.

The instance that I have reference to occurred about two months ago. I told the officer that he had to stop it or I would report him to higher authority. He said he would not practice it any more, so I never informed on him; but now I have information about him doing the same, and even worse, nearly every day.

While I was one of a detachment of 24 men doing garrison duty in the town of Pasay, 3 miles from Manila, a native man about 21 years of age was arrested and accused of being a murderer, highway robber, and accused of rape. Now, whether the man was guilty or not I do not know, but anyway Lieut. F. T. Arnold, for he was the officer in command, gave orders to Sergeant Edwards, both of Troop H, Fourth Cavalry, to take the man to the basement of our quarters and get what information he could out of the man.

So Edwards took the man and asked him if he had any information to give. The man had none. Edwards said to the rest of the soldiers who had congregated to witness the "fun" that he would have to commence operations. The prisoner was stripped naked and laid on his back on the bare floor. He was then given the "water cure." A rough stick about 8 inches long and a half inch in diameter was put between the man's jaws. A soldier held the man's head down by pressing on the ends of the stick. Another sat on the man's stomach, and still another sat on the man's legs. Edwards had a bucket of water at hand. Water was poured down the man until it was vomited up. It was then repeated.

This water cure must be a terrible torture alone. The man heaved and begged for mercy, but to no avail. While down he was whipped and beaten unmercifully. He was then stood up and asked to confess. He did not. He was then beaten and clubbed again. I do not think that a square inch of the man's body was left untouched. He was kicked. A rope was then thrown across a beam. The man was strung up by the thumbs. Another rope was tied to his ankles and his feet jerked from under him. While up he was beaten.

All this time I was a looker on. I hoped that the punishment would stop. I dared not interfere. But when the man was strung up by the neck I could stand it no longer, so I went to the lieutenant. Before I went to him I did not know that he had given orders to Edwards to torture the man if he did not confess. I told Arnold that I was an American and that there was something going on at the quarters that I could not stand. He jumped all over me and asked if I was not making myself very busy. I said I was not; that such carryings on were against all law.

He said, in a very sarcastic manner, that I knew such a lot about law. He said that a lot of men in the Army, especially volunteers, think that they know how to run an army, but they do not. He said: "Now, when I give a man to Sergeant Edwards, I want information. I do not know how he gets it, but he gets the information anyway." He said that these people have no feelings other than physical and should not be treated as human beings. I told Arnold that I did not come to get anyone in trouble, but merely to have the torture stopped; that if it were not stopped I would report the matter to higher authority.

I was then threatened with court-martial for insubordination. About this time Edwards came in and said that he had succeeded in making the man tell where the money was. Arnold told Edwards to take the man with him and get the money.

I told Arnold that as the torture was finished I would not report the matter if it were not repeated. He promised not to do it again. I then left him.

The prisoner did not show where the money was. He had only said that he would show the hiding place to have the torture stopped. Three weeks later the prisoner was released. Now, that was criminal of Arnold. If the man was guilty he should not be released. If guilty he should not be tortured anyway.

The rest of the time that I was with the detachment under Arnold no torture was committed that I know of.

Now, Arnold has a detachment of 20 men at Calaca, 7 miles from here, Men that are under him now have told me that Arnold is having men tortured the same as before and other ways besides. This is one of his new ways: A strip of flesh is cut just above the ankle of the prisoner; it is then attached to a stick; the stick is coiled with the strip of flesh. Imagine the torture the poor man must endure! I am told that when Arnold is out looking for some criminal or suspected insurgent he will grab, or have his men grab, any native and ask for information.

If a man gives no information, he is put to all kinds of torture. I saw the man that was cut at the ankle. I was over at Calaca the other day. He had his leg all bound up and was out in the road with other prisoners working.

Last week a part of this troop, a part of the Calaca detachment, and some of the soldiers from Taal were out in the mountains. I was not along, but have been told by several men that Arnold had his men take an old man to a stream and keep him under water until the man was unconscious. This was because the old man did not give certain information that he was supposed to possess.

Men of H Troop have told me that they have known Arnold to have a man tied to a saddled horse. A few feet of slack was allowed. A man was then mounted on the horse and told to gallop down the road for a mile and then back. If the prisoner could run as fast as the horse, it was all well, but if he could not he had to drag. Arnold has had this done several times, and more than once the prisoner was dragged.

Now, I have witnesses for all that I have written about, and should there ever be an investigation of this I will be perfectly willing to be put upon the stand. I know other men that would be willing to do the same.

I believe that most of the officers and enlisted men in the Army are humane, but those that practice what Arnold has should be brought to justice.

It would do me no good to report this matter through Army channels, as it would only be hushed up, and then I would get the worst of it.

Now, I am writing this letter to you; you are a close relation of mine, and for that reason I believe I can write anything. I think that you should bring this before the proper persons.

Lieut. Frederick T. Arnold was appointed to West Point from Iowa in 1893. He graduated from West Point in 1897 and was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Sixth Cavalry. He is now second lieutenant of Troop H, Fourth Cavalry.

I hope that the proper people of the United States will take hold of this case and have all torture in these islands stopped.

Well, my dear uncle, as I have already written so much on this subject, I will not write about other subjects. I am in fine health, and hope that you are the same. Give my love to all.

I remain, your loving nephew,

ANDREW K. WEIR, JR.,
Troop C, Fourth United States Cavalry, Balayan, P. I.

CAPTAIN WEST'S REPORT.

OFFICE OF THE INSPECTOR-GENERAL,
DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN LUZON,
Manila, P. I., August 27, 1901.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN LUZON.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the investigation made by me into the complaint of Private Andrew K. Weir, Troop C, Fourth Cavalry, against Lieut. F. T. Arnold, Fourth Cavalry, in regard to the cruelties practiced by Lieutenant Arnold upon native prisoners at Pasay and Calaca, Luzon:

Sergt. George Schurman, Troop B, Fourth Cavalry, stated that he had witnessed the punishment of the prisoner at Pasay and that the facts were correctly stated in Private Weir's letter to his uncle. The prisoner was choked, beaten, hung up by the thumbs, and then by the neck, and given the water cure, and was whipped with rattans, this whipping being so severe as to bring blood on the prisoner's legs. That this punishment was all inflicted by Sergeant Edwards and three native policemen.

Private George Bowers, Troop B, Fourth Cavalry, stated that he had only heard of the punishment of the prisoner at Pasay. I believe this man knows more about the cruel treatment of prisoners at Pasay and Calaca than he stated, but the departure of his troop for the United States prevented me from examining him thoroughly.

Private James B. Barry, Third Cavalry, formerly of troop B, Fourth Cavalry, stated that he witnessed the treatment of the prisoner at Pasay and that it was brutal. He corroborated the statement of Private Weir in regard to this prisoner's treatment.

He stated that Sergeant Edwards often talked of the way he had beaten native prisoners. He stated that while corporal of the guard near Taal he had charge of about 50 native prisoners and that he had orders to turn them over to Sergeant Edwards whenever he wanted them, and that Lieutenant Arnold told Sergeant Edwards in his (Barry's) presence that he could take them out whenever he wanted to and to get what information he could out of them, and that Sergeant Edwards and the native scouts frequently took out one or two prisoners and would keep them out from half an hour to an hour. He did not know whether or not they were badly treated while out with Sergeant Edwards.

Corpl. George E. West, Troop B, Fourth Cavalry, stated that while corporal of the guard at Calaca he had seen native prisoners brought to the guardhouse whose shins looked like they had been rubbed with a stick, but he did not know how they got in this condition.

Corpl. S. J. Peterson, Troop B, Fourth Cavalry, stated that he did not know personally that native prisoners had been cruelly treated, but the general impression among the men at Calaca was that Sergeant Edwards was torturing these prisoners, and had Lieutenant Arnold's permission to do so.

Corpl. Charles Austin, Troop B, Fourth Cavalry, stated that he was stationed with the detachment at Calaca under command of Lieutenant Arnold, and that his (Austin's) quarters were very near where the scouts under command of Sergeant Edwards lived; that he had seen Sergeant Edwards take native prisoners from the guardhouse to the scouts' quarters and shortly thereafter heard cries and groans coming from these quarters; that he saw them take one prisoner from the guardhouse to the scouts' quarters, and when he was returned to the guardhouse his shins looked as though they had been scraped with a stick. He did not know whether or not Lieutenant Arnold knew that prisoners were being badly treated, but the impression was that he knew all about it.

Private John Tuck, Troop B, Fourth Cavalry, states that while stationed at Calaca he had seen, through the windows of the scouts' quarters, prisoners being whipped with rattans by Sergeant Edwards and the scouts; that while on detached service near Calaca with Sergeant Edwards and the scouts he saw them abuse and beat an old man and made them stop it; that Sergeant Edwards took the prisoner off into the brush after this, and he (Tuck) heard two shots, and then Sergeant Edwards came back without the prisoner and stated that he had had a fight with the prisoner and showed where he had been bitten on the arm and said, "He will be down there a long time." Private Tuck did not know if the prisoner had been killed nor whether Lieutenant Arnold knew about the prisoners being badly treated.

Private James M. Whitney, Troop B, Fourth Cavalry, stated that he was a member of the detachment at Calaca under command of Lieutenant Arnold, and that while in the scouts' quarters one day he saw a native prisoner on the floor, and that the prisoner was bucked and the scouts, in the presence of Sergeant Edwards, were rubbing the prisoner's legs with a broomstick, and that this treatment was brutal; that while on detached service with Sergeant Edwards and the scouts near Calaca he saw them beat a native in a brutal manner; that Sergeant Edwards told him that Lieutenant Arnold knew all about the way the natives were being treated. Private Whitney stated that Privates Reeves and Graham, of Troop C, Fourth Cavalry, could tell all about the inhuman treatment of prisoners at Calaca.

I was informed that Privates Fielding, St. Clair, and Taylor, of B Troop, Fourth Cavalry, could also give testimony on this subject, but the departure of the troop for the United States prevented me from finishing this investigation.

I believe that a thorough investigation into this matter will substantiate the charges made by Private Weir, that prisoners were treated in a cruel and harsh manner and that Lieutenant Arnold winked at this treatment.

Very respectfully,

P. W. WEST,
Captain, Fifth Cavalry, Inspector-General Department of Northern Luzon.

APPENDIX NO. 3.

[Extract from the Washington Post of June 19, 1902, relating to General Smith's order and trial.]

The record, which the President has received, contains the exact language of the admissions made by Colonel Woodruff, counsel for General Smith, in regard to the orders which the latter officer issued to Major Waller, United States Marines. The charge was "conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline," and it was supported by this specification:

"In that Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith, U. S. A., commanding general of the Sixth Separate Brigade, Division of the Philippines, did give instructions in regard to the conduct of hostilities in the island of Samar, P. I., to his subordinate officer, Maj. L. W. T. Waller, United States Marine Corps, the said Major Waller being under his command and commanding at the time a subterritorial district in the island of Samar, P. I., in language and words, to wit:

"I want no prisoners" (meaning thereby that giving of quarter was not desired or required), and "I wish you to kill and burn. The more you kill and burn the better you will please me," and "the interior of Samar must be made a howling wilderness," and did give further instructions to said Major Waller that he, General Smith, wanted all persons killed who were capable of bearing arms, and did, in reply to a question by the said Major Waller, asking for an age limit, designate the age limit at 10 years.

"This at or near the island of Samar, P. I., between the 23d and 28th days of October, 1901."

SMITH'S PLEA AND ADMISSIONS.

The record then gives General Smith's plea to the charge and specifications, which was "not guilty." Colonel Woodruff's statement, which was partially cabled at the time it was made, is then given in full as follows:

"The accused desires to simplify this case as much as possible, and admits that he was commanding general of the Sixth Separate Brigade, Division of the Philippines; that Major Waller was one of his subordinate officers, commanding a subterritorial district, and that he did give him personal instructions relating to hostiles under arms in the field, and he did instruct him not to burden himself with prisoners, of which General Smith already had so many that the efficiency of his command was impaired, and tell him that he wanted him to kill and burn in the interior and hostile country; and did further instruct him that the interior of Samar must be made a howling wilderness; and did further instruct him that he wanted all persons killed who were capable of bearing arms and were actively engaged in hostilities, and that he did designate the age limit at 10 years, as boys of that age were actively engaged in hostilities against the United States authorities and were equally dangerous as an enemy as those of more mature age."

The record then shows that the judge-advocate asked this question:

"Does the accused admit that as his statement?"

"I do," was the response of General Smith.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] twenty minutes.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, as to creating a civil government in the Philippine Islands—upon that matter if I have anything to say, I will print it in my remarks under the general leave. I make the declaration that whenever a Democrat shrieks and howls throughout this country that these people are fit to govern themselves, he can not convince the American people, because any American, or any man in the House or Senate, who has read closely the history of the Philippine Islands and the conditions surrounding them, if he has any common sense left, knows that they are not yet fit to assume independence. It is a great problem, but our Government will solve it in the interest of the people of the islands. But under this cloak of liberty for the Philippine people the Democratic party and the Democratic press are trying to throw a stigma upon the American Army in the Philippines and upon the magnificent officers who have charge of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are a great many on the Democratic side of the House too young to know about, or if they have read of the cruelties practiced in this highly civilized and Christianized nation of ours, they have forgotten or never read about them. I propose to supplement the few remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] as to what was done in this country during the years from 1861 to 1865. I do not defend any cruelties practiced either by officers or men, where they can be avoided. I am not here to rake up the fires of the past, but simply want to quote a little of our war history. I shall quote the history of a people engaged in a war who claim to be a highly civilized, educated, and Christianized people, and show what went on in this country and what is going on in the Philippine Islands is not worth mentioning in comparison.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose to show the outrages and inhuman treatment perpetrated by the Confederates during the war of the rebellion from 1861 to 1865, alongside of which the few scattering irregularities and offenses committed by our Army in the Philippine Islands sink into insignificance. So that I may be correct, I quote from an official document, printed as Report No. 45, House of Representatives, Fortieth Congress, third session, same being a "Report on the treatment of prisoners of war by the rebel authorities during the war of the rebellion." This report is made up from testimony from the following sources:

First. The sworn and unsworn testimony of prisoners in narrative form.

Second. The testimony of Union officers and soldiers.

Third. Testimony of rebel officers and soldiers.

Fourth. The testimony of citizens residing in the vicinity of Andersonville.

Fifth. Medical testimony derived from Union and rebel sources.

Sixth. Documentary evidence from rebel sources.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MAHON. I am reading from the report of the treatment of prisoners of war by the rebel authorities—a document of the third session of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know that there was a greater percentage of deaths of Confederate prisoners in Northern prisons than of Federal prisoners in Southern prisons?

Mr. MAHON. I will give the gentleman the facts about that, for I have the data right here.

STATISTICS OF MORTALITY—COMPARISON BETWEEN UNION AND REBEL PRISONS AND PRISONERS.

While a partial result only can be given of the total number of deaths of Union prisoners occasioned by prison treatment and the various incidental causes already described, even where the hospital and other returns have been procured, by reason of the subsequent mortality of the survivors who lived to reach our lines and which has been alluded to elsewhere, the committee will endeavor to approximate the ratio of deaths as compared with the whole number imprisoned on each side.

Let us take Andersonville:

Whole number of prisoners confined at Andersonville	40,611
Deaths from February 24 to September 21, 1864 (seven months)	9,479
Per cent of mortality	23.34

Or nearly one-fourth of the whole number of prisoners confined there.

The War Department estimates that 20 per cent should be added to this mortality for reasons stated in the accompanying report, among which is the fact that the deaths were not all recorded. The committee accept the estimate as very nearly correct. This is shown in part by a comparison of the record with the number of graves of Union prisoners there ascertained by actual count. For instance:

Number of deaths shown by record	12,631
Number of graves	13,705
Difference	1,074
Per cent of difference (nearly)	8

There are other causes stated in the report of the Department which swell this per cent.

Again, the condition at Andersonville in the month of August, 1864, according to Confederate reports, was as follows. The report of Captain Wirz shows:

Prisoners on hand	31,678
Died during the month	2,993
Average daily deaths (nearly)	100
Monthly per cent of mortality	9.45
Yearly per cent of mortality	113.40

At Salisbury, from September, 1864, to February, 1865 (five months), the condition was as follows:

Number of prisoners confined	10,000
Deaths during that time	5,000
Per cent of mortality	50

At this prison 12,112 prisoners died during its occupancy. "My squad," says one witness, "numbered 100 men on the 6th day of December, 1864, and when we came out from there on the 22d day of February, 1865, we drew rations for 28 men, 61 of the number having died, the remaining 11 having been transferred to other prisons."

At hospital No. 21, Richmond, according to the statement of Dr. Jones, a Union prisoner, who was hospital steward at "No. 21," the mortuary result was:

Union prisoners admitted in three months	2,700
Deaths during that time	1,450
Per cent of mortality (nearly)	50

The prisons at Florence and Belle Isle, with others, would show a mortality approximating that in the prisons above described. We know the causes, and Dr. John C. Bates, Confederate surgeon at Andersonville, says in his testimony: "I feel myself safe in saying that 75 per cent of those who died might have been saved had these unfortunate men been properly cared for as to food, clothing, bedding, etc."

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF MORTALITY.

The report of the War Department shows the following captures by the Confederate forces:

Federal officers		7,092
Enlisted men		179,091
Union citizens		1,962
Total		188,145
Of these there were legally paroled and exchanged	154,330
Illegally paroled	1,143
Total paroled and exchanged		155,473
To be accounted for		32,672

As the statement of the War Department consolidates the Federal prisoners paroled and exchanged, the committee are unable to determine from this source what proportion of captives were actually confined in rebel prisons. But the Federal authorities paroled 10,514 in excess of one-half of their captives. Let us then take this proportion of one-half as the basis of our calculation, assuming (although it gives undue advantage to the rebels) that the rebels paroled one-half of their prisoners. This would leave us the following result:

Total number of captures by rebels	188,145
Number paroled, estimated at one-half	94,072
Number actually confined in prison	94,072
Number of deaths in Confederate prisons, ascertained by the graves	36,401
Per cent of mortality in rebel prisons	38.70
Per cent of mortality of entire rebel captures	19.35

Let us compare this with the mortality of rebel soldiers captured by the Federal armies:

Total number of captures by Federals	476,169
Paroled	248,599
Number actually confined in prison or left as prisoners of war in our hands	227,570
Mortality of Confederate prisoners, ascertained by the graves	30,152
Per cent of mortality in Federal prisons	13.250
Difference per cent in favor of Union authorities	25.450
Per cent of mortality of entire Union captures	6.350
Difference per cent in favor of Union authorities	13.020

If the mortality of rebel prisoners captured by the Union forces had equaled that of Union soldiers captured by them, taking the whole number of captures as a basis of calculation, the deaths among the 476,169 Confederates in our hands would have been 92,000 instead of 30,152; or, calculating it upon the reduced basis of the prisoners retained in custody on both sides, to wit, 227,570 Confederate prisoners in our hands to 94,072 prisoners in their hands, the mortality would have been 88,000 instead of 30,152. Instead of this the mortality is reversed, and out of 94,072 prisoners in confinement by the rebels 36,401 died, while out of 227,570 in the hands of the Federals only 30,152 died. In other words, nearly 2 out of 5 or 40 of each 100 died in their hands, while 1 in 17 or 6 of each 100 died in ours.

This showing makes the difference of mortality nearly seven times as great among the prisoners in their hands as among the prisoners in ours.

Now, Mr. Chairman, of course we all know that General Sherman said that "war is hell." And for this purpose I simply wanted to call the attention of the House to these facts. I have read only a part of this report. It embraces the evidence of Union prisoners and also of men who were in the Confederate service, both officers and privates. It tells of cruelties inflicted at Andersonville, at Salisbury, and Belle Island. If any man will sit down calmly and read this investigation, he will come to the same conclusion that I have reached—that is, you might search all the passageways and all the caverns of hell itself, and the devil and all his friends would be at a loss to conjure up and inflict upon the unfortunate inhabitants in those regions such tortures as were inflicted upon our men in Andersonville prison and other Southern prison pens.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS AT TIME OF CAPTURE.

In striking contrast with the uniform kindness of Union soldiers to their captives taken in battle was the treatment experienced by our officers and men immediately upon falling into the hands of the enemy. The harsh and brutal conduct of the rebels toward their unfortunate prisoners furnishes a constant and leading theme for the denunciation of the survivors. It commenced usually by unmanly jeers and taunts unworthy the character of a soldier and undeserved by the heroic men who had been compelled to yield to the fortunes of war. This was followed by a rigid and humiliating search of clothing and person, sometimes taking place on the field of battle, sometimes postponed until the arrival of the captive at the first prison station. This search was renewed as often as the caprice of cupidity of the officer might dictate. Such searches were but the admonition of robbery. Surplus clothing, oftentimes necessary clothing, watches, money, everything of value, was seized and appropriated by the captors, and even the keepsakes of the soldiers were unrespected by these military robbers.

Pictures of wife and children, father or mother, brother or sister, of no value to the stranger, but inexpressibly dear to him who was to linger for months in hopeless confinement, were wantonly torn from their possession and made the subject of ribald jest and ridicule.

In ancient times the custom of robbing prisoners of their private property was very common and was a much less offense than violence inflicted on their persons. The private property of prisoners of war should be respected. The prisoner, being at the time of his capture in the legitimate and commissioned service of his government, and the captors bearing the same relation to theirs, both parties are the agents of their respective governments and their private property is in no way involved in the contest and should not be seized and converted to the public use, because in a public war there is no contest between private individuals and the opposing governments. Nor should it be seized by the captors for private use, as both are agents and in any other than the character of soldiers meet on equal terms, and the act would become a robbery which the individual captor commits with the power if not sanction of his government. This would place the civilization of this age back of the fifteenth century, and authorize private wars and captures, with the attendant troubles of that class of paroles and ransoms which embarrassed the age of chivalry.

Well-organized governments regulate and settle the relations and difficulties between the citizens of their respective jurisdictions by public authority, and will not use public power to wrong or rob individuals. All public property or contraband of war found in possession of prisoners should be seized by the captors on behalf of their government, but that which belongs to them, such as clothing and money, even if taken to prevent its improper use, should be returned again in good faith.

The United States Army Regulations of 1861, pages 107 and 108, provides as follows:

"745. Prisoners of war will be disarmed and sent to the rear, and reported as soon as practicable to the headquarters. The return of the prisoners from the headquarters of the Army to the War Department will specify the number, rank, and corps.

"746. The private property of prisoners will be duly respected, and each shall be treated with the regard due to his rank. They are to obey the necessary orders given them. They receive for subsistence one ration each, without regard to rank, and the wounded are to be treated with the same care as the wounded of the Army. Other allowances to them will depend on conventions with the enemy."

Early in the war the enemy observed the idle ceremony of making a list of the property seized, professedly for safe-keeping and restoration, but instances where any were returned are extremely rare. Even in the few cases where money was restored, Confederate scrip, nearly worthless, was substituted dollar for dollar for the money of which the soldier had been robbed. It will be found that this practice met the severe animadversion of the inspecting officer of rebel prisons, but their recommendations for a change in its practice seem to have been entirely disregarded. It seems that after the second year of the war even this formality was almost or entirely abandoned, and prisoners were not only robbed of money, surplus clothing, and valuables, but were often deprived of coats, shoes, and hats, and in many cases stripped of everything but shirt and drawers, until at last the rebel captor came to regard his Union victim as one who, even as a prisoner of war, had no rights which a rebel was bound to respect. The testimony will be found replete with instances of the actual truth of this assertion, evincing a spirit of fiendish cruelty shorn of all just regard for the rights of the living, as it was destitute of all respect for the persons of the dead.

This search and robbery of prisoners was sometimes accompanied by the most cruel violence. In the early part of the war the demand for the surrender of valuable articles was freely complied with, but after learning from the testimony of others the failure of the rebel authorities to make restoration of the property which had been given up, and learning the importance of having money and clothing during captivity, efforts were naturally made by our men to conceal their valuables before or after capture. The detection in these attempts was constantly followed by punishment of a cruel and sometimes of a revolting character. Some of the most aggravated cases of beating and other personal violence were inflicted solely on account of this detection. The officers at Richmond, as shown by the testimony, became by practice specially expert in searching and robbing prisoners and detecting concealment. During the year 1864 a system of researching was in vogue in all the prisons, so that our officers and men were compelled to run the gantlet and submit to the indignity of a new search at each transfer from prison to prison. These outrages, so clearly in direct violation of the laws of war, and in turpitude and crime so nearly akin to the robbery of the dead, necessarily increased the helpless condition of our soldiers, depriving them of procuring the necessaries and comforts which might otherwise have been attainable, and rendering them a more easy and facile prey to the disease and death which spread their sable pall over the prison houses of the South.

Nor was the immediate cruelty inflicted thus early upon the Union soldier confined to robbery and personal violence. Instant and long marches, short rations, scarcity of water, and transportation fit only for beasts destined for the shambles were the common incidents of his early captivity. The facts disclose a cool and malicious disregard of the condition and comforts of the prisoners taken in battle and an evident intention on the part of the Confederate authorities to lose no time in the attempt to break them down in body and in spirit and render them unfit for future service to their country. Men wounded in the arms or body were forced to make long marches, guarded by cavalry, and when unable longer to keep pace with the column were beaten and cut with the sabers of their guard in order to force them forward, until they fell by the roadside dead, where they were often left unburied.

Prisoners transported on railroads through the South were almost invariably packed into close box-cars, the sick and well, the wounded and unwounded, from sixty to eighty huddled together in each car. These cars were often used for this purpose without cleansing, immediately after cattle had been taken out of them, and the excrement of the beast was the bed of the men. Insufficient guards were provided on such occasions, and the cars consequently kept closely shut, sometimes for several days in succession, the men not being allowed to leave them for any purpose. Such was the bitter and terrible preparation of the devoted soldier of the Union for his entrance into the charnel houses of Richmond and Andersonville.

The testimony shows the mode of search adopted and the ingenuity with which concealments were made. The prisoners were stripped entirely naked and their clothes examined, sometimes by cutting and ripping such portions as were supposed to contain secreted money and other valuables. This was followed by an exploration of the person, every part of which was closely examined for articles of value. These were sometimes found secreted in the hair, whiskers, mouth, ears, nose, or other parts of the prisoner's person. A detection was usually followed by severe punishment. Sometimes at the time of exchange a demand was made by the prisoners for the return of their money, but this was generally met with denunciation and oftentimes with violence. This deliberate and systematic robbery of defenseless men was pursued at Richmond in sight and hearing of the higher rebel officials and not far from the residence of Jeff. Davis. Sounds of revelry and carousal at the seat of treason could be heard by these wronged, robbed, and outraged prisoners as they lay on the bare floors of the buildings where they were confined, deprived by their inhuman captors of the barest necessaries of life.

The transportation of the prisoners in the crowded and suffocated condition which we have described was not the result of any necessity. It was caused by no forced retreat from a battlefield or any emergency of a similar character, but was the usual mode of transit of prisoners to and from stockades in the heart of the Confederacy. So horrible were the sufferings endured in these journeys that every possible effort was made by the prisoners to escape from the cars while in motion, and many cases are noticed where in the night, they succeeded in forcing open the door or in cutting holes through the sides of the car, and by that means attempted to escape, preferring to risk their lives in this forlorn hope rather than endure the tortures of travel. For many interesting recitals of these attempts, their failure and success, the reader is referred to the testimony of the witnesses. An instance of wanton cruelty occurred on the occasion of a squad of prisoners leaving Richmond early on a winter's morning, who, after a night of snow and rain, were compelled to march through the streets, many of them barefooted, their feet bleeding from wounds occasioned by the roughness of the road.

With an honorable foe the rules of civilized warfare obtain, and when an enemy falls into his power by capture or surrender he seeks to alleviate his sufferings to the extent of his ability. He becomes for the time his friend and protector as well as captor. But such was not the usual practice of officers and soldiers composing the rebel army, and here we have in this particular, as in many others, a striking contrast between the opposing forces in the late war. As a writer has said:

"The treatment of prisoners of war is a significant test of civilization in any people or nation. It is the only amenity that redresses a thousand violences engendered by belligerent relations, or it is the one cruelty that casts all others into the background. In proportion as we find a tribe or community advanced in human progress we are prepared to expect a sympathy for the weak or defenseless, and it is only in barbarous or savage life that we look for the torture of unarmed men or the abuse of noncombatants. Hence it is difficult to realize that a distinct and large portion of the American people should be chargeable with such enormities of prison maltreatment as have become matters of fact in history during four years of civil strife. And yet we are constrained by positive evidence to arraign the Government and citizens of the rebel States on charges of cruelty such as disgrace civilization and belie Christianity."

We close our remarks on this subject by an allusion to two prominent facts, which will be treated more at large in other parts of this report. We refer to the massacre of the troops by Forrest's command at Fort Pillow, and to the well-authenticated account of the murder and assassination of colored prisoners at the time of their capture in the field.

While the murder of these Union soldiers was more merciful than the starvation of the white troops, it was no less startling and striking in its development of the savage cruelty which seems to have usurped in the breasts of the Confederate officials the kindlier sentiments of humanity which among civilized people tend to assuage and mitigate the sufferings incident to war.

The sufferings of Union prisoners at Andersonville have never been equaled in intensity, duration, and magnitude in modern times.

The crimes of Andersonville are the crimes of the age in which we live. As it had no precedent or example, so it can have no counterpart in the future. We shall not enlarge upon the sickening and terrible details. We have spread out the testimony upon the record; let him who can contradict it, and search history for its equivalent.

That the causes which led to these sufferings were not accidental or inevitable in their origin, but were deliberately planned and were the direct results of human agency, ingenuity, malice, and cruelty.

Human foresight, though it had been the offspring of mediocrity, could have obviated and prevented the greater part of this terrible suffering. It is clear that abundance of fuel, timber, water, and rations could have been supplied by the rebels themselves with few and inconsiderable exceptions, and even had this been impossible the wants of the starving prisoners could and would have been supplied by the Government of the United States and the great organized charitable associations which from time to time sent supplies through the rebel lines.

Another remedy could have been applied—one which it was the duty of the Confederate Government, acting within the scope of military rules, to have resorted to—which was to parole the prisoners whom they could not care for properly and deliver at our lines or permit them to return to the North, instead of pursuing them with hounds and hunting them for recapture like beasts of prey in the forests and swamps of the South. But that was not the purpose, nor were these the motives which honor the humanity of the age.

The numerous expressions of hatred and cruelty which fell from the lips of the rebel officials, their extraordinary punishments, and the deadly assaults on the sick and helpless, the neglect more cruel than death, can have no solution except in the deep-seated malice whose fruits we have been considering.

That the responsibility of these horrors can not be restricted to the immediate agents in charge of the prisoners, but rests with irresistible weight on the higher officials of the Confederate Government, with whose knowledge and consent they were perpetrated.

ANDERSONVILLE PRISON.

It seems fitting and proper that in the special description of rebel prisons, upon which this report is about entering, the spot on which during the terrible year of 1864 was concentrated the greatest amount of human suffering the records of civilized warfare can present, and the name which, supplanting all others in our language, has passed into a synonym of the cruelty and atrocity of man, should first demand our attention. Andersonville was a representative prison. The mournful interest which now centers in its history and which must in the future attend the recital of its accumulated horrors has impelled your committee to bestow upon its origin and progress, its government and results, a leading attention, to examine with earnest care and to lay before the House a large amount of evidence drawn from all accessible sources.

In this respect its history will be found more extended and elaborate than that of other prisons, but your committee have been drawn to this latitude of investigation and remark by an irresistible sense of what was due to the importance of the subject. But it must be confessed that before this appalling monument of the cruelty of man, and in the contemplation of the surrounding horrors which the victims of rebel barbarity have spread before us in the solemn utterances of their sworn statements, all power of description stands abashed or retires from the hopeless task of painting the unutterable sufferings and atrocities of Andersonville. It was here, in what was once the "Empire State of the South," that the victims who fell by starvation and murder at the hands of the Confederate authorities approximated closely in numbers the victims who were sacrificed by the Spanish Inquisition, through long centuries of persecution and woe.

Strange and appalling as it may seem, such was the result, well authenticated and irrefutable, of the twelve-months' confinement which our soldiers endured in this model prison house of the Confederacy. This mortality was not the result of sudden and fearful accident or startling casualty, but ensued through long, lingering, cruel sickness, punishment, madness, and suffering almost too terrible for relation. The protracted horrors of Andersonville are the significant features which arrest the mind at every step of this investigation. No cessation of suffering, no episode of relief furnishes its chapter in this terrible history. To the barbarous treatment of the warriors of Algeria by the Government of France there was, at times, a pause; to the cruelties of British India there was a cessation; to the tragic night of the Black Hole of Calcutta succeeded a morning of relief, but from the cruelties and horrors of Andersonville there was to the suffering heroes of the Union no relief but death; death by neglect; death by starvation; death in the land of the stranger at the hand of felon rebels; a lingering and horrible death, terrible to contemplate, and which came at last a sole reward of bravery, patriotism, and Christian fortitude.

The general descriptions of Andersonville prison have been frequent, and are familiar to many readers, while the vivid relation of personal sufferings endured within its walls have been spread broadcast throughout the land. The description which this report seeks to furnish must be largely divested of the interest with which the relations of personal experience serve to clothe the narrative of their sufferings, but following closely the statements of the witnesses who have been examined, must necessarily, in other respects, bear a marked resemblance to those which have preceded it. And your committee beg leave to say that they have not hesitated to make free and ample use of all the well-authenticated and truthful sources of information furnished by the concurrent history of the time, as well as the special evidence which it has been their duty to collect.

The Andersonville prison was situated about half a mile distant from the station which furnishes its name, on the Southwestern Railroad, leading from Macon to Americus, about 65 miles southerly of the former city. It originally consisted of a few buildings used for storing commissary and quartermaster supplies in the possession of the rebel authorities. Its location was selected in the latter part of 1863 by Capt. W. S. Winder, a son of the rebel general, J. H. Winder, after the rejection of several places more suitable to the health and comfort of the prisoners, and with the intention, as is asserted, of building a pen for the "damned Yankees where they would rot faster than they could be sent." In January, 1864, a stockade was here erected of pine logs, about 20 feet in height, inclosing an area of some 17 acres. To this was given the name of "Camp Sumter." In the following July this inclosure was enlarged to afford room for the confinement of an increased number of prisoners, which was accomplished by extending the old stockade some 40 rods to the north, the work being performed by the inmates of the prison.

With this addition the stockade inclosed 23½ acres lying in the form of a parallelogram, with the surface somewhat depressed in the center, the elevations being at the northerly and southerly ends. Across this parallelogram from west to east, and about one-third from the distance to the southerly end of the stockade, ran a sluggish stream of water 6 feet in width and bordered on each side by a low swamp, embracing an area of 6 acres. This swamp, which was uninhabitable except for the festering vermin and maggots that were afterwards suffered to swarm in its stagnant and loathsome filth, became in time the receptacle of the offal which naturally drained into it from the surface of the camp, as well as the wash and waste of the cook houses and camps outside.

Outside of the stockade, near where the stream entered it, the cook house was located, and further up the rebel guards were accustomed to wash and bathe, while closer to the stockade animals were permitted to die and rot in its waters. This stream was the only place, with the exception of a few shallow wells and springs, from which the prisoners could procure water for general use, and from this loathsome sewer constantly rose the pestilent vapors so fatal to human life. Where the water entered the stockade it was covered with a mantle of filth, grease, and drippings, that constantly floated upon it when the creek was at its ordinary stage. Inside of this stockade the approach to the creek was through the swamp alone, while this in turn was filled with the offal of the camp, which was never removed except as it was partially carried out by flooding rains.

Outside of the main stockade were two other lines built for defense and protection in case of attempts to escape on the part of the prisoners, the outer one being 12 and the second 16 feet in height. The hospital was situated outside of the lines some distance from the southeast corner of the camp, having been erected in June, 1864. Previous to this an apology for a hospital was located within the stockade. There were two entrances into the stock ade, both on its westerly side, one north and the other south of the stream, secured by strongly constructed gates.

It was guarded and garrisoned by rebel troops, whose camps were located west of the stockade. Sentry boxes—35 in number, well sheltered from sun and rain—were provided for the guards and placed outside, near the top and around the stockade, so erected at intervals of a hundred feet as to permit the occupant to see what transpired among the prisoners within. On eminences commanding the camps were forts, well supplied with artillery and heavily garrisoned.

The country around the Andersonville prison was thickly studded forest of towering pines, the space occupied by the camp having been cleared for the purpose of its location. In the midst of this abundance, and with the full knowledge of the highest officers of the Confederacy, Union prisoners of war were compelled to eat raw food and perish for want of fire and shelter.

Inside of the stockade, parallel with its lines and about 20 feet distant, was the "dead line," marked by scantling nailed upon upright posts, which were planted in the ground at regular intervals. It was indeed the line of death. To pass it or to encroach upon the fatal precinct beyond brought the penalty of death to all without distinction.

The purpose of its establishment was to guard the line of the stockade against the approach of the prisoners, either singly or in numbers. The rule of prohibition was applicable to all, and its violation met with instant and inexorable punishment. The penalty was inflicted without discrimination or mercy. It fell alike upon the tottering sick and the strong and well, on the sane and demented, on the staggering wretch whose failing limbs made him the unwilling victim, and the suffering maniac who neither knew nor dreaded his danger. The burning thirst of the fevered prisoner which impelled him to reach beneath it for a drop of water purer than the stagnant pool was quenched in death by the relentless rifle of the guard, while the ignorant prisoner, freshly captured, and who had not learned its dread significance, fell by the same merciless hand under the standing orders of the officer in charge. The well-authenticated cases of these indiscriminate and unjustifiable murders will be found in the following narrations, with the names of many innocent victims who were thus sacrificed:

Although situated in a southern latitude, the climate of Andersonville showed a wide variation of temperature, ranging form 18° to 112° F. in the shade. In the year 1864 were counted 108 rainy days, in which fell more than 4½ feet of rain. Around it and in its immediate vicinity flowed a score of clear, healthy streams, abounding in delicious water, while the neighborhood is remarkable for its crystal springs, whose translucent waters invite and gratify the taste of man. It was here that on the 27th of November, 1863, young Winder planted the prison of Andersonville. Rejecting the inviting localities which had been provided in the immediate vicinity by the beneficent hand of nature, and most admirably adapted by all their surroundings for the dwelling place of the unfortunate prisoners of war—among them the Magnolia Spring, 12 miles distant from Americus—the rebel officer and agent selected the site we are describing.

To prepare this charnel house, the accursed labor of the slave was at once brought into requisition, 600 of them being impressed for this purpose by Howell Cobb, then commanding the district in which Andersonville was situated. The first installment of captives—consisting of the soldiers of New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Michigan, numbering in all some 800 men—reached the prison on the 15th day of February, 1864. They were met with the jeers and taunts of the gaping crowd, composed of all classes, who flocked from the surrounding country to gaze upon these "invaders of the soil." These early visitors were the representatives of that public sentiment of mingled hate and contempt so common among the rebels, which led them to uphold and vindicate, officially and individually, the terrible excesses that have rendered the name of the Confederacy a reproach and hissing in the history of the world.

Unquestionably they regarded these unfortunate men as unfit to live, and treated them accordingly. With this sentiment of the "people" so often expressed, the officers of the prison were soon found to be in perfect accord. As the captured Union men flowed, week by week, into the jaws of Andersonville, they were subjected to a system of plunder, inaugurated in the purlieus of the rebel capital, and robbed of whatever could be found upon their persons. There were here no shallow pretenses or lame excuses for this course, secret theft or bold robbery being the rule adopted, especially with those of the newly arrived prisoners, who came fresh and amply clothed from the well-furnished depots of the Northern recruiting stations.

In April of 1864 John H. Winder, the personal and trusted friend, warm partisan, and willing tool of Jefferson Davis, arrived at Andersonville. There is ample evidence that the President of the Confederacy was his intimate friend and protector. When his crimes had driven others to protest against his retention in the service of the Confederacy, the influence of Davis saved him from removal and disgrace. The relation which this man bore to the chief and head of the rebellion is well described by the witness, Philip Cashmyer, as follows:

"For the last four years I was detective officer under General Winder. I was with General Winder from the time he commenced his duties as provost-marshal until he died. I was his special confidential detective. Well, my duties were any important matter such as detectives have to attend to I attended to for him, such as examining prisoners and making reports upon them, and matters of that sort. I was admitted into his family also. The relations existing between him and Mr. Jefferson Davis were very friendly, indeed; very confidential. I often heard General Winder say so. I often saw him go there and come from there. I remember when an effort was made by Generals Bragg and Ransom to have him removed Mr. Davis—President Davis—was his special friend then. When the order relieving General Winder came from the war department, he took it and went up to Mr. Davis. The order was relieving him from duty in Richmond. He took it and went over and saw President Davis, and he indorsed on it, as well as I can recollect, that it was 'entirely unnecessary and uncalled for.'

"After that General Winder was sent to Goldsboro, N. C., to take the field. He was there a week or two, and an order then came for him to go to Andersonville and take command there. His powers were not extended for some months after that. They were then. They made him commissioner-general, commissary-general of prisoners. They called him commissioner-general. I still continued with him till he died in my tent at Florence, S. C. As well as I can recollect the order sending W. S. Winder to Andersonville to lay out the prison came from the war department. General Winder desired to send him and the war department sanctioned it. I saw the son go with the general down to the war department and come from there."

PUNISHMENT OF FEDERAL PRISONERS.

An enumeration of the punishments inflicted in rebel prisons will hardly find credence with the general reader; but the accumulated testimony of a hundred witnesses establishes their existence in all their brutal, unnatural, and appalling enormity. Certain it is that they could never have been enforced, even under the coercion of military power and discipline, except by men known and distinguished for their total disregard of the common feelings of humanity. Such, indeed, were the men selected by the rebel authorities as instruments of vengeance, for the punishment and torture of those who were so unfortunate and wretched as to be thrown by the fortunes of war into their hands. In the spirit of their masters, which was indeed the spirit of hell, they performed their dreadful mission. It was to such men alone that the orders of the Confederate leaders could be safely intrusted. Thank God, no such spirit found a lodgment in the breast of any Union officer or soldier charged with the care and custody of helpless prisoners of war. Had it been possible for the Administration of Mr. Lincoln to have ordered retaliation in kind for the sufferings of our men at the hands of the rebels, the officers and soldiers of the Union Army would have shrunk with instinctive dread and horror from its infliction though the penalty had been disgrace and death. Let us rejoice that their honor, their patriotism, and their virtue were spared the terrible trial.

The modes of punishment disclosed by the testimony are too numerous to admit of further detailed description in this report. Attention will therefore be called only to the most notorious and those in more general use, viz: "The stocks," "chain gangs," "bucking and gagging," "spread eagle," "wooden horse," "tieing up by the thumbs."

The "stocks" were of two kinds. In one the prisoner was tied to a wooden frame with his arms extended and his feet closely tied together, in which position, unable to move either hand or foot, he was compelled to stand, or, as was sometimes the case, lie upon his back during the time of his confinement. In the other the prisoner's feet were fastened in a wooden frame elevated so that it was usually impossible for him to sit up and compelling him to lie upon his back. The stocks were without shelter of any kind. In them prisoners were confined for days, exposed to the scorching sun and the rain.

Many of those confined in the stocks died while undergoing the fearful punishment. The stocks at Andersonville were between the headquarters of Wirz and the stockade. This punishment, which was adopted at other prison pens, was inflicted on recaptured prisoners and for so-called insubordination.

The "chain gang" was composed usually of 12 or more prisoners placed in two ranks. Their feet were shackled so they could step but a few inches, and a heavy iron collar was placed around each man's neck. A heavy chain extended from collar to collar and from shackle to shackle. Each man had a small iron ball attached to one of his legs, while a 64-pound ball was added to every 4 men, upon the inside of the square thus formed. If a prisoner died while in the chain gang, as was sometimes the case, he was not immediately removed. His comrades were compelled to drag his dead body with them until the pleasure of the officer or guard relieved them. Prisoners were kept in the chain gangs as long as two weeks at a time, the shackles around the ankles in the meantime cutting or wearing through the flesh to the bones.

"Bucking and gagging" was frequently resorted to. The prisoner was seated on the ground, his wrists firmly tied together and placed over his knees and a stick run under his knees and over his arms at the elbow joints. A stick or "gag" was then placed in his mouth and tied tightly by strings extending back of his head. In this position the sufferer (often a sick man) was kept several hours in the sun. This mode of punishment prevailed at all the prisons, and was inflicted for the most trivial (real or imaginary) offenses.

"Spread eagle," or the "sweating process," was inflicted as follows: The victim was placed upon his back on the ground and his arms and legs extended, in which position he was fastened and left without either food or water. Many who were subjected to this punishment died before the expiration of the sentence.

The "wooden horse" was a high trestle, upon which the prisoner was placed, his hands tied behind him, a gag placed in his mouth, and his legs drawn apart by ropes attached to his ankles and fastened to stakes in the ground. During the winter of 1863-64, at Belle Isle, men were kept on the "wooden horse" until nearly frozen to death.

"Tying up by the thumbs" was, during its continuance, one of the most severe punishments inflicted. The prisoner's arms were elevated, his thumbs tied by strings, and then he was raised up so that his heels would clear the ground, thus bringing a considerable portion of his weight upon his extended arms and thumbs. The victims usually fainted while undergoing this torture. In such cases they were let down until restored to consciousness and then hung up again. This process was continued four or five times in some cases, and in some instances the thumbs of the sufferers became so injured as to require amputation.

CAPTURE OF ESCAPED PRISONERS.

The spirit that prompted weak and emaciated men to undertake and bear the hardships of an escape from prisons, closely guarded, in the heart of the Confederacy, with countless dangers before them from crossing rivers, long journeys among their enemies, without food and almost without clothing, watched by men and hunted by dogs trained alike to their destruction, proves sufficiently the suffering and desperation which accompanied the terrible captivity of our soldiers who were willing to take the almost hopeless risk, which in some cases appeared suicidal and in many resulted fatally.

Prisoners would escape, and sometimes for several days wander in the woods and swamps suffering from hunger and cold, only to be at last discovered by the hounds, attacked, and perhaps severely torn before their masters called them off. When thus recaptured, they were returned to camp, and usually received punishment by the stocks or chain gangs or by being bucked and gagged. As a part of their punishment all medical treatment was denied them when they were suffering from the attacks of the dogs, and frequently the sores caused by wounds thus received became inflamed and gangrene ensued for want of proper treatment, causing the death of the captive.

TREATMENT OF UNION MEN.

Its inspection and the few letters and depositions of Union citizens which your committee have thought useful to publish, will show that a large class of these men were arrested and kept in imprisonment for expressing or being suspected of entertaining Union sentiments, and sometimes for failing to participate actively in the rebellion. In confinement they were treated with especial rigor and cruelty, perhaps on the presumption that there was no power, civil or military, that could demand relief for them or enforce retaliation; that they were, in fact, without the pale of military or civil law. It will enforce the conviction that the malignity and hatred of the rebels were as intense toward their neighbors and fellow citizens as against the Northern soldier captured in arms. Driven from their homes, their houses burned, their property destroyed or stolen, their lands laid waste, they wandered among the hills and mountains or lay concealed in swamps and woods in constant danger from the guerrillas who swarmed on their trail, and at last captured and thrust into prison, they shared the most infamous and cruel treatment to which the prisoners of war were subjected by the rebels.

They were the victims of personal animosity and public vengeance. They were thrust into State jails and penitentiaries, as well the military prisons of the South. Their sufferings were augmented by anxiety for the families from which they had been torn and who were left helpless to the merciless inroads of armed and desperate men. For them there was little hope of exchange, parole, or release, yet true to their love of country, firm in adherence to the government of their fathers, they remained unmoved in their loyalty amidst their sufferings and trials, refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the government which their enemies had set up. When the lives and experiences of these devoted men shall have been written in their country's history, the nation will do them honor and acknowledge with gratitude their services for the cause of the Union.

BRUTALITY AT FORT PILLOW.

It was at Fort Pillow, however, that the brutality and cruelty of the rebels were most fearfully exhibited. The garrison there, according to the last returns received at headquarters, amounted to 19 officers and 538 enlisted men, of whom 262 were colored troops, comprising one batallion of the Sixth United States Heavy Artillery (formerly called the First Alabama Artillery) of colored troops, under command of Maj. I. F. Booth; one section of the Second United States Light Artillery, colored, and one batallion of the Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry, white, commanded by Maj. W. F. Bradford. Major Booth was the ranking officer, and was in command of the post.

On Tuesday, the 12th of April (the anniversary of the attack on Fort Sumter in April, 1861), the pickets of the garrison were driven in just before sunrise, that being the first intimation our forces there had of any intention on the part of the enemy to attack that place. Fighting soon became general, and about 9 o'clock Major Booth was killed. Major Bradford succeeded to the command, and withdrew all the forces within the fort. They had previously occupied some intrenchments at some distance from the fort and further from the river.

This fort was situated on a high bluff which descended precipitately to the river's edge, the side of the bluff on the river side being covered with trees, bushes, and fallen timber. Extending back from the river on either side of the fort was a ravine or hollow, the one below the fort containing several private stores and some dwellings, constituting what was called the town. At the mouth of that ravine and on the river bank were some Government buildings, containing commissary and quartermaster's stores. The ravine above the fort was known as Cold Creek ravine, the sides being covered with trees and bushes. To the right or below and a little to the front of the fort was a level piece of ground, not quite so elevated as the fort itself, on which had been erected some log huts or shanties, which were occupied by the white troops, and also used for hospital and other purposes. Within the fort tents had been erected, with board floors, for the use of the colored troops. There were six pieces of artillery in the fort, consisting of two 6-pounders, two 12-pound howitzers, and two 10-pound parrots.

The rebels continued their attack, but up to 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon they had not gained any decisive success. Our troops, both white and black, fought most bravely, and were in good spirits. The gunboat No. 7 (New Era), Captain Marshall, took part in the conflict, shelling the enemy as opportunity offered. Signals had been agreed upon by which the officers in the fort could indicate where the guns would be most effective. There being but one gunboat there, no permanent impression appears to have been produced upon the enemy; for as they were shelled out of one ravine they would make their appearance in the other. They would thus appear and retire as the gunboat moved from one point to the other. About 1 o'clock the fire on both sides slackened somewhat, and the gunboat moved out on the river, to cool and clean its guns, having fired 282 rounds of shell, shrapnell, and canister, which nearly exhausted its supply of ammunition.

The rebels, having thus far failed in their attack, now resorted to their customary use of flags of truce. The first flag of truce conveyed a demand from Forrest for the unconditional surrender of the fort. To this Major Bradford replied, asking to be allowed one hour to consult with his officers and the officers of the gunboat. In a short time a second flag of truce appeared, with a communication from Forrest that he would allow Major Bradford twenty minutes in which to move his troops out of the fort, and if it was not done within that time an assault would be ordered. To this Major Bradford returned the reply that he would not surrender.

During the time these flags of truce were flying, the rebels were moving down the ravine and taking positions from which the more readily to charge upon the fort. Parties of them were also engaged in plundering the Government buildings of commissary and quartermaster stores in full view of the gunboat. Captain Marshall states that he refrained from firing upon the rebels, although they were thus violating the flag of truce, for fear that should they finally succeed in capturing the fort they would justify any atrocities they might commit by saying that they were in retaliation for his firing while the flag of truce was flying. He says, however, that when he saw the rebels coming down the ravine above the fort and taking positions there he got under way and stood for the fort, determined to use what little ammunition he had left in shelling them out of the ravine, but he did not get up within effective range before the final assault was made.

Immediately after the second flag of truce retired, the rebels made a rush from the positions they had so treacherously gained and obtained possession of the fort, raising the cry of "No quarter!" But little opportunity was allowed for resistance. Our troops, black and white, threw down their arms and sought to escape by running down the steep bluff near the fort and secreting themselves behind trees and logs, in the bushes, and under the brush, some even jumping into the river, leaving only their heads above the water, as they crouched down under the bank.

Then followed a scene of cruelty and murder without a parallel in civilized warfare, which needed but the tomahawk and scalping knife to exceed the worst atrocities ever committed by savages. The rebels commenced an indiscriminate slaughter, sparing neither age nor sex, white or black, soldier or civilian. The officers and men seemed to vie with each other in the devilish work. Men, women, and even children, wherever found, were deliberately shot down, beaten, and hacked with sabers; some of the children not more than 10 years old were forced to stand up and face their murderers while being shot; the sick and wounded were butchered without mercy, the rebels even entering the hospital building and dragging them out to be shot, or killing them as they lay there unable to offer the least resistance. All over the hillside the work of murder was going on. Numbers of our men were collected together in lines or groups and deliberately shot. Some were shot while in the river, while others on the bank were shot and their bodies kicked into the water, many of them still living, but unable to make any exertions to save themselves from drowning.

Some of the rebels stood on the top of the hill or a short distance down the side and called to our soldiers to come up to them, and as they approached shot them down in cold blood; if their guns or pistols missed fire, forcing them to stand there until they were again prepared to fire. All around you heard cries of "No quarter," "No quarter," "Kill the damned niggers; shoot them down." All who asked for mercy were answered by the most cruel taunts and sneers. Some were spared for a time, only to be murdered under circumstances of greater cruelty. No cruelty which the most fiendish malignity could devise was omitted by these murderers. One white soldier who was wounded in one leg so as to be unable to walk was made to stand up while his tormentors shot him; others who were wounded and unable to stand were held up and again shot.

One negro who had been ordered by a rebel officer to hold his horse was killed by him when he remounted; another, a mere child whom an officer had taken up behind him on his horse, was seen by Chalmers, who at once ordered the officer to put him down and shoot him, which was done. The huts and tents in which many of the wounded had sought shelter were set on fire, both that night and the next morning, while the wounded men were still in them, those only escaping who were able to get themselves out or who could prevail on others less injured than themselves to help them out; and even some of those thus seeking to escape the flames were met by those ruffians and brutally shot down or had their brains beaten out.

One man was deliberately fastened down to the floor of a tent, face upward, by means of nails driven through his clothing and into the boards under him, so that he could not possibly escape, and then the tent set on fire; another was nailed to the side of the building outside of the fort, and then the building set on fire and burned. The charred remains of five or six bodies were afterwards found, all but one so much disfigured and consumed by the flames that they could not be identified, and the identification of that one is not absolutely certain, although there can hardly be a doubt that it was the body af Lieutenant Akerstrom, quartermaster of the Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry, and a native Tennesseean. Several witnesses who saw the remains and who were personally acquainted with him while living have testified that it is their firm belief that it was his body that was thus treated.

These deeds of murder and cruelty ceased when night came on, only to be renewed the next morning, when the demons carefully sought among the dead lying about in all directions for any of the wounded yet alive, and those they found were deliberately shot. Scores of the dead and wounded were found there the day after the massacre by the men from some of our gunboats who were permitted to go on shore and collect the wounded and bury the dead. The rebels themselves had made a pretense of burying a great many of their victims, but they had merely thrown them, without the least regard to care or decency, into the trenches and ditches about the fort, or the little hollows and ravines on the hillside, covering them but partially with earth. Portions of heads and faces, hands and feet, were found protruding through the earth in every direction.

The testimony also establishes the fact that the rebels buried some of the living with the dead, a few of whom succeeded afterwards in digging themselves out, or were dug out by others, one of whom your committee found in Mound City Hospital, and there examined. And even when your committee visited the spot, two weeks afterwards, although parties of men had been sent on shore from time to time to bury the bodies unburied and rebury the others, and were even then engaged in the same work, we found the evidences of this murder and cruelty still most painfully apparent. We saw bodies still unburied (at some distance from the fort) of some sick men who had been met fleeing from the hospital and beaten down and brutally murdered, and their bodies left where they had fallen. We could still see the faces, hands, and feet of men, white and black, protruding out of the ground, whose graves had not been reached by those engaged in reinterring the victims of the massacre, and although a great deal of rain had fallen within the preceding two weeks, the ground, more especially on the side and at the foot of the bluff where the most of the murders had been committed, was still discolored by the blood of our brave, but unfortunate men, and the logs and trees showed but too plainly the evidences of the atrocities perpetrated there.

Many other instances of equally atrocious cruelty might be enumerated, but your committee feel compelled to refrain from giving here more of the heart-sickening details and refer to the statements contained in the voluminous testimony herewith submitted. Those statements were obtained by them from eyewitnesses and sufferers. Many of them, as they were examined by your committee, were lying upon beds of pain and suffering, some so feeble that their lips could with difficulty frame the words by which they endeavored to convey some idea of the cruelties which had been inflicted on them and which they had seen inflicted on others.

How many of our troops thus fell victims to the malignity and barbarity of Forrest and his followers can not yet be definitely ascertained. Two officers belonging to the garrison were absent at the time of the capture and massacre. Of the remaining officers but two are known to be living, and they are wounded and now in the hospital at Mound City. One of them, Captain Potter, may even now be dead. We, the surgeons, when your committee were there, expressed no hope of his recovery. Of the men, from 300 to 400 are known to have been killed at Fort Pillow, of whom at least 300 were murdered in cold blood after the post was in possession of the rebels, and our men had thrown down their arms and ceased to offer resistance. Of the survivors, except the wounded in the hospital at Mound City and the few who succeeded in making their escape unhurt, nothing definite is known; and it is to be feared that many have been murdered after being taken away from the fort.

In reference to the fate of Major Bradford, who was in command of the fort when it was captured and who had up to that time received no injury, there seems to be no doubt. The general understanding everywhere seemed to be that he had been brutally murdered the day after he was taken prisoner.

There is some discrepancy in the testimony, but your committee do not see how the one who professed to have been an eyewitness of his death could have been mistaken. There may be some uncertainty in regard to his fate.

When your committee arrived at Memphis, Tenn., they found and examined a man (Mr. McLagan) who had been conscripted by some of Forrest's forces, but who, with other conscripts, had succeeded in making his escape. He testifies that while two companies of rebel troops, with Major Bradford and many other prisoners, were on their march from Brownsville to Jackson, Tenn., Major Bradford was taken by five rebels—one an officer—led about 50 yards from the line of march, and deliberately murdered in view of all there assembled. He fell, killed instantly by three musket balls, even while asking that his life might be spared, as he had fought them manfully and was deserving of a better fate. The motive of the murder of Major Bradford seems to have been the simple fact that, although a native of the South, he remained loyal to his Government. The testimony herewith submitted contains many statements made by the rebels that they did not intend to treat "home-made Yankees," as they termed loyal Southerners, any better than negro troops.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can understand that prisoners may have unavoidably suffered from want of food or similar deprivation. But what "torture" was imposed upon them?

Mr. MAHON. There was one prisoner hanged down there.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That may have been by way of punishment. We hang people daily, except Sunday, in time of peace. I am talking about "tortures" inflicted on prisoners.

Mr. MAHON. I am not reflecting upon the gentleman, of course, or implying that he would do anything of this kind; but it is a well-known fact that in the Andersonville prison no physician ever entered that stockade. Men who were confined there for ten or twelve months know this fact. There was not a tent to shelter them from the broiling sun or the beating storms; not a blanket was issued with which they might cover themselves. A little bit of corn bread was hauled in to the prisoners in the morning, and the dead of the prison were loaded, like hogs at a slaughter-house, into the same wagon that brought in the bread and hauled out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the Confederacy have an overflowing treasury with which to buy provisions like the United States now has?

Mr. MAHON. Let me tell the gentleman who had charge of those prisons. He was a confidential, personal friend of Jefferson Davis. He had the superintendence of all these prisons. There were within 10 miles of Andersonville most magnificent springs, the Magnolia Spring and others, as well as fine creeks and rivulets of water, and in those regions camps could have been located where these men could have had at least plenty of good water. But the man who located this camp, who did it deliberately, putting it in that swamp, was Gen. W. R. Winder. I have a letter here which shows that he was the confidential friend of Jeff. Davis. Even Confederate officers, as this report shows, appealed to him time and time again to remove these men to more comfortable quarters, but he refused to do so. I have here an extract from the Richmond Examiner. My friend can tell me what was the politics of that paper; I do not know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am waiting for the gentleman to get at the acts of "torture."

Mr. MAHON. When this man left the theater of his crimes through death the Richmond Examiner exclaimed in mingled horror and joy:

It is necessary here to dwell upon this man's character or history at much length. He has passed to his long and last account, leaving behind a name which will seldom be uttered by the lips of any Union prisoner unless associated with thoughts of that fearful retribution which can alone in the dread future furnish an adequate expiation of his crimes against mankind. He had been employed at Richmond as the prison agent of Davis, and his cruelties had become proverbial among all, both rebel and Union. So terrible was his history that when he left the theater of his crimes for Andersonville the Richmond Examiner exclaimed, in its mingled horror and joy: "Thank God that Richmond is at last rid of old Winder! God have mercy upon those to whom he has been sent!"

We shall not dwell upon the career of this wretch. He deserves execration, not history. His long and confidential intercourse with Jefferson Davis would, were it possible, stamp the character of the Confederate chief with double-dyed infamy, as it served to heighten and enlarge the terrible cruelties for which the official head of the rebellion will be held responsible before the civilized and Christian world. As illustrating the justice of the paragraph just quoted from the Richmond Examiner, we submit the following order, issued by this agent of starvation and murder, while in command at Andersonville.

Nobody knew whether he had gone to hell or heaven, but the Richmond Examiner asked for mercy on the people of the place he may have gone to.

Now, I want to read an order which that man issued. Our army was approaching Andersonville. We had sent a column in that direction to rescue these 30,000 men.

[Orders, No. 13.]

HEADQUARTERS CONFEDERATE STATES MILITARY PRISON,
Andersonville, July 27, 1864.

The officers on duty and in charge of the battery of Florida artillery at the time will, upon receiving notice that the enemy have approached within seven miles of this post, open fire upon the stockade with grapeshot, without reference to the situation beyond these lines of defense.

It is better that the last Federal be exterminated than be permitted to burn and pillage the property of loyal citizens, as they will do if allowed to make their escape from prison.

By order of John H. Winder, brigadier-general:

W. S. WINDER,
Adjutant-General.

At the time of this unparalleled and hellish order the maimed prisoners who would have been the victims of its execution numbered more than 30,000 men. This was an order issued when it was ascertained that the Federal army was on the way, and remember that at the date of this order there were 30,000 of these unfortunate men in this prison.

So, if the Federal troops had been so unfortunate as to have gotten within 7 miles of that confederate prison, every man in the prison would have been shot to death under that order.

Mr. NEVILLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question at this point?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; I will yield and try to answer any question.

Mr. NEVILLE. If the people of the North were justly indignant on account of the atrocities committed in Andersonville prison, ought the people not now to be justly indignant on account of the brutality in the Philippine Islands? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. NEVILLE. Then why parade Andersonville prison as an excuse?

Mr. MAHON. And whenever the United States Government under the Republican party permits such outrages to be perpetrated, even to the one-hundredth part, the people of this country should sweep them out of power from the Presidential chair down to the lowest office in a county. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not know it is true that while those prisoners he speaks of were subjected to all the punishment that goes with confinement of prisoners in war, there was a standing proposition from the Confederate authorities at the time the prisoners at Andersonville were suffering the most to exchange man for man?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And officer for officer with the Federal authorities, and if the proposition of the Confederate authorities did not stand rejected for months?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. While these deaths were occurring?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; and the gentleman, who was a Confederate officer, if he reads the history he will find this statement to be true: Our men in rebel prisons had been starved; they were emaciated and some of them were maniacs.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. And out of the 65,000 men held in rebel prisons there were not 3,000 of them that could come back to the Northern Army and handle a musket, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman, further, if the Federal authorities were not notified that the Confederacy did not have medicines, that they were not prepared, on account of the blockade, to take care of even their own soldiers, and notwithstanding that, if the Federal authorities did not refuse to exchange man for man and officer for officer? I assert that is true.

Mr. MAHON. They made that offer when they held 65,000 of our men who were absolutely unfit for military duty at the time they made the offer or ever afterwards, and the proposition came to this Government to hand you back an army of 72,000 Confederate prisoners who were in the prisons of the North, able-bodied, hale men, so that you might strengthen your Confederate Army with 72,000 men who were able to do military service, and you give us in return 65,000 men that would never again be able to do service.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But surely the gentleman will not admit that he was not willing to give an able-bodied man for a sick man? Will the gentleman say that?

Mr. MAHON. Just wait until I am through. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] You were kind enough to make the offer after you had deliberately, I say, starved these men to the verge of death, left them out in the rain without shelter and without blankets; and when they were in this condition, near the close of the war, when Grant was pushing the Confederate armies to the wall and victory was perching upon the Union banners, the Confederate authorities were willing then to exchange and have us give them fresh recruits, and the President and the War Department after long deliberation, believing the war was near an end, declined the offer and allowed them to remain there.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How do you account for the fact that more Confederate prisoners died in Northern prisons than Union prisoners died in Southern prisons?

Mr. MAHON. There were more of them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You reported captures of men who never went to prison, but of those who went to prison and stayed in Northern prisons a larger per cent died than of Union men who went to Southern prisons.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not true. That statement can not be proved.

Mr. MAHON. That is not true.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is true, and the record shows it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I beg your pardon.

Mr. MAHON. I will put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the official report to show that it is not correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have them right here now.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. No, I will not. I have the official records here. I do not know where you got yours.

Mr. BARTLETT. I got mine from Surgeon-General Barnes, and from the official report of the investigation that was made.

Mr. MAHON. I got mine from the published reports.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I never heard that fact denied before.

Mr. BARTLETT. It can not be successfully denied.

Mr. MAHON. I am referring to this criticism of the American Army on account of a few black Filipinos. I believe some soldiers took a white pony from a little Filipino boy, and burned a few shacks or houses that probably were not worth a hundred dollars.

Mr. KAHN. They were worth about $30 apiece.

Mr. MAHON. I hold in my hand a report which shows that Frederick Wild, an officer of the Thirteenth Infantry, has been court-martialed for the burning of a cockpit at some place in the island of Luzon. Here is an officer of the American Army who has been court-martialed and convicted of the offense of burning a cockpit where the Filipinos fight chickens. I would burn all the cockpits in the island if I had my way. Now, let me tell you something about burning, something that I know about personally.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I congratulate the gentleman if he is going to do that.

Mr. MAHON. We have heard a great deal about burning of these shacks, worth a few dollars apiece. We have heard a great deal about taking ponies and horses. We have heard a great deal about taking a small amount of personal property. Now, I am not referring to these matters to reflect in any way upon the Confederate soldiers who were in the field. No man in this House has greater admiration for them than I have. They were brave men. They were not always responsible for what their officers in the rear did. I have in my pocket an order that I am going to refer to. In the war of the rebellion I, with a hundred other young men, left my native city, a small place of 5,000 inhabitants, situated in the Cumberland Valley. It is known as the Queen City of the Cumberland Valley. In 1864 that city was burned. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to state that in 1863, about twenty-five days before the battle of Gettysburg, when Meade's army and our soldiers were away down here in Virginia somewhere, one morning about 6 o'clock, while our little city was filled with women and children—a large percentage of the men were away in the war—a Confederate cavalry officer, General Jenkins, approached the town while its citizens were in bed——

Mr. GROSVENOR. What town was that?

Mr. MAHON. The town of Chambersburg. At 6 o'clock in the morning this officer planted a battery upon the hill overlooking the town, and without notice to a living soul in it, without even sending in a flag of truce, opened his guns upon those sleeping women and children.

Mr. NEVILLE. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. NEVILLE. Since the people of the South are assisting the people of the North in behalf of the Administration in the war in the Philippine Islands, what is the object in raking up old scores to especially smirch the South? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MAHON. I am simply doing it to show that even in this highly civilized and Christianized country, as old General Sherman said, "War is hell," and these little picayune, peanut affairs that you gentlemen on that side are talking about, which are incidental to the war in the Philippines, are nothing in comparison with things that have happened in this country in the way of atrocities and unbridled license and vandalism.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAHON. No; I have no time. The gentleman may ask his question after a while. On the 30th of July, 1864, a year after the battle of Gettysburg, this same city that had been shelled on the previous occasion that I have referred to was approached by a body of Confederate cavalry under General McCausland at daybreak at a time when there was not a Union soldier within a hundred miles of the place. It was not a defended town, there were no fortifications or guns there. It was an agricultural city, with merchants attending to their business and the farmers tilling the soil around them. The city was approached by Confederate troops under orders, and I have the official order here, issued by General Early. It shows how our friends on the other side could retaliate. The order reads as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, July 25, 1864.

Instructions for Generals McCausland and Johnson: Cross your brigades at McCoys Ferry or Clearspring, and then proceed to Hagerstown, and from there to Chambersburg. At Chambersburg levy $100,000 gold or $500,000 in Northern money to pay for the houses of Andrew Hunter, Alexander R. Boteler, Edmund Q. Lee, of Jefferson County, Va., which were burned by order of the Federal military authorities; and if the money is not paid, burn the entire town as a retaliation for the burning of these houses and others in the State of Virginia by Federal authorities. Burn the depots at Chambersburg.

Now, Mr. Chairman, General McCausland sent Colonel Peters, of the Twenty-first Confederate Cavalry, into the town. Colonel Peters received his orders to burn the town. On the back of it he wrote this: "I did not enlist in the Confederate Army to fight defenseless women and children and burn them out of their homes, and I deliberately refused to enforce this order." [Loud general applause.] Signed by Colonel Peters, a gallant Confederate officer. Another regiment was sent hurriedly in its place, when all the people of that city were in their beds and perhaps not half a dozen knew that the Confederates were across the Potomac. With fagot and torch, soaked in kerosene, they set fire to houses, and within an hour the city was aflame, and in less than two hours 5,000 women and children and men were on the hills, homeless, and without clothing, except their night clothing. Mr. Chairman, the mother with a baby but an hour old was carried from her home which was on fire; the man who was at death's door was carried out of the house that was in flames. The dead had to be carried out. Now, that order was deliberately issued.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Who issued that order? I did not hear who the gentleman said issued it.

Mr. MAHON. It was issued by General Early. I have read a copy of the official order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the date of that order?

Mr. MAHON. July 25, 1864.

Mr. Chairman, in less than one hour millions of dollars' worth of private homes were swept out of existence, and 5,000 defenseless women and children were upon the hills simply as retaliation for the burning of a few houses in the Shenandoah Valley by order of Federal authority.

Mr. CURRIER. Only two are mentioned.

Mr. MAHON. Two or three. This order mentions but three houses. I suppose there were more.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the date of that order? I did not hear.

Mr. MAHON. It is dated headquarters, July 25, 1864.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It was done in July.

Mr. LOUD. That was long before the burning in the Shenandoah Valley.

Mr. MAHON. That was before the burning in the Shenandoah Valley. That followed. Now, Mr. Chairman, I simply relate this piece of vandalism. It was nothing but vandalism. It has never been equaled in warfare by the barbarians of the Dark Ages. Why, Mr. Chairman, if we were to go on burning in the Philippine Islands for the next twenty years or the next forty years at the rate the other side charge us with doing, there would not be one-tenth of the property destroyed that there was destroyed by the Confederate Army in Chambersburg in one hour.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that we will have to "burn" that long in the Philippines before we conquer those people?

Mr. MAHON. I think you would have to do it to burn up three millions of property.

Mr. HULL. They could not do more if they were to burn a hundred years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It would be a good thing for the lumber interests over there.

Mr. MAHON. I have referred to this history to refresh the memories of gentlemen on the other side of the House. If any gentleman in this House or any citizen of this country will take this document and read it over and examine the evidence and see the condition of affairs we had in this country during the civil war, when he gets up to talk about a man in the Regular Army burning a thing down there—what do you call it, a cockpit?—down in the Philippine Islands, and burning down a few shacks, I do not think we would hear the speeches made on the other side that we do hear. Now, war may be war, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAHON. Give me another minute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I give the gentleman the balance of the time until 5 o'clock.

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have read of these irregularities, getting them from the papers and as printed at the War Department. There never was a war since the days of creation, and never will be, but some irregularities will happen. Men will forage and plunder; the best disciplined army will have a few men in it guilty of outrages. I want to say this to my friends on the other side. These things that I have read to you, whether you could have prevented them or not, I do not know, but I simply called your attention to them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that we on this side accept this with all proper humility. But why does not the gentleman lecture his colleague [Mr. SIBLEY], who made the first talk in this matter?

Mr. MAHON. I do not go to Brother SIBLEY's school; I go to another teacher. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I want to say to you gentlemen from the Southland that you are born fighters. No braver men can be found anywhere under God's bright sun than you gentlemen that come from the South. So it is in the Northland. We come of one blood, we are one flesh, and we might say that we are not only fighters, but we are educated fighters. We might give it another term and say we are civilized fighters. We fight for Old Glory, our flag, "every step of whose progress has been toward some Sinai of human hope and human happiness," and upon its fair folds not a blot appears.

Some of the boys in the Philippines are from the Southland as well as from the North. They are American soldiers, carrying the American flag, upholding the sovereignty of the United States, and when the history of our soldier boys is written, and when the historian has had time to tell of their deeds of hardship and valor under a tropical sun, when we read it we will all be proud of the boys we had in the Philippine Islands from the Southland and Northland. There is no better army anywhere in this wide world to-day than the American Army fighting under our flag. [Applause.]

I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that as a Republican I do not fear the assaults on our Army by the Democratic leaders. The American people are true to the boys who wear the American uniform. [Applause.] You may attack them as much as you please. I wish this debate was not so late in the session, that it could be protracted for a month, and give you full time to uncover your demagoguery. You gentlemen will find in the great West, in the Northwest, and in the East, when we go upon the hustings to get control of this House again and to manage its affairs, you will find the voters will stand by the boys that wear the blue uniform, and will return a Republican majority in this Congress to defend them in the future as they have in the past. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. VANDIVER. I want to ask the gentleman if in all his search in the records of the civil war and the barbarities of civilized warfare he has ever found an instance where on either side helpless prisoners were tortured for the purpose of extorting information?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a common occurrence in every war.

Mr. MAHON. If the gentleman who controls the time can give me ten minutes more time, I will show you hundreds of cases in the South where those who sympathized with the United States Government were abused and tortured.

Mr. RUMPLE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. RUMPLE. I know personally of threats, presentation of revolvers at the heads of soldiers, being threatened with death at the point of the revolver, that unless they did give information they would be shot down. That was done in the Mississippi Valley. I was present.

Mr. MAHON. If I had time I could show the gentleman other cases.

Mr. STEELE. There was a little bit of that at Fort Pillow, was there not?

Mr. MAHON. I have a case now under my eye where a judge of a United States court in the State of Mississippi was concerned. It grew out of the feeling of the war. It grew out of hate that war always engenders, and he was shot down on his porch in the presence of his wife and children by Confederate cavalrymen who were away from their command, and probably if the colonel had known of it he would have shot them.

Mr. VANDIVER. I can readily understand how cases of retaliation might occur on either side during war; but the practice of torture for the purpose of securing information or confession has always been condemned by civilized people.

Mr. MAHON. Were you a Confederate officer?

Mr. VANDIVER. No, sir.

Mr. MAHON. If you were such an officer, or if you were familiar with the history of the war as known to your own people, you might hold a different view. Probably you thought it justifiable down there to attack men who were supposed to hold or who did hold and perhaps openly proclaimed Union sentiments. You ought to know that cruelties were inflicted on those people.

Mr. VANDIVER. I have some recollection——

Mr. MAHON. I will say that I was in the Army, and consequently was absent from the North during a considerable period of the war; but I confess that if I had been at home in the North I would have been ready to take a copperhead and throw him out of the window; and it would not have taken very much to have tempted me to put some of those copperheads of the North under torture—water cure—to keep them from talking.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Committee of the Whole under the rules of the House must rise.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration Senate bill No. 2295 had come to no resolution thereon.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. I submit a conference report, with the statement of House conferees, on the Army appropriation bill, in order that it may be put in the RECORD.

The report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 18, 20, and 21.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 16, 17, 19, 22, 24, and 25, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "all," in line 4, page 22 of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and an inspection;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert "promptly;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On the amendments of the Senate numbered 14 and 15 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, report:

Amendments Nos. 1 and 2 simply change the names of military schools; and same are agreed to by House.

No. 3 gives to officers in the Regular Army the benefit of service in the Volunteer Army in computing leaves of absence; and amendment is agreed to.

No. 4 provides additional tests before men from the ranks can be commissioned; and Senate recedes.

No. 5 relates to detail, and makes explicit that officers detailed shall not serve beyond the age of retirement; and House agrees to same.

No. 6 relates to restoration of retired officers to active service, and it is agreed to by striking out all in regard to such proposed legislation and let the law remain as now.

No. 7 relates to promotion of ordnance storekeeper on retirement; and House agrees to same.

No. 8 relates to retired longevity pay; and House recedes.

Nos. 9 and 10 relate to increased pay of officers serving outside of United States proper; and House agrees to same.

No. 11 gives enlisted men of Regular Army credit for time served in volunteer organizations; and House agrees to same.

No. 12 relates to inspection of horses; and House agrees to same, with an amendment providing for an inspection under the direction of Secretary of War.

No. 16 relates to post exchanges; and House agrees to same.

No. 17 relates to building sites in Philippine Islands; and House agrees to same.

No. 18 relates to battlefield at Balls Bluffs; and Senate recedes.

No. 19, punctuation; House recedes.

No. 20 increases the appropriation for Medical Department; and Senate recedes.

No. 21 provides for paying medical bills of regular and volunteer soldiers on furlough; Senate recedes.

No. 22 gives Medical Department right to get instruments repaired without advertising; and House agrees to same.

No. 23 relates to reports; and House agrees to same, with amendments striking out "immediately" and inserting "promptly."

No. 24 provides for barracks for engineers' school; and House agrees to same.

Nos. 13, 14, and 15 not in conference.

Managers on the part of the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. I submit a conference report, with accompanying statement of House conferees, on the naval appropriation bill, in order that they may be printed in the RECORD and lie over. I give notice that to-morrow I will call up this report for consideration.

The report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 10, 11, 22, 35, 41, 44, 48, 49, 59, 60, 63, 65, 66, 67, 69, and 78.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 28, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 42, 45, 51, 53, 54, 55, 62, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 79, 80, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, and 90, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out insert the following: "One clerk in charge of distribution of books, at $1,200;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert the following: "$31,402.52;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "to complete building No. 19, $60,000; extension to dispensary building, $1,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Condemnation of land adjacent to the Norfolk Navy-Yard: The Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to cause to be commenced, within three months after the passage of this act, proceedings for the condemnation of the following tract of land, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary, for the use of the United States for the Norfolk Navy-Yard and for other naval purposes, namely, the tract of land known as the Schmolles property, containing some 272.4 acres, more or less, in Norfolk County, Va., and adjacent to the Norfolk Navy-Yard, under the act of Congress approved August 1, 1888, entitled 'An act to authorize the condemnation of lands for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes,' and other laws of the United States, so as to completely vest in the United States the title of said land. And all such proceedings shall be reported to Congress at its next session by the Secretary of the Navy."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Publication of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac: Hereafter there shall be published of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac 2,500 copies, 500 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for distribution or sale by the Navy Department."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 82: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 82, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 64 strike out lines 5, 6, and 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In all, pay Marine Corps, $1,831,129.23."

[MEMORANDUM.—This instead of a straight recession, so as to allow change of total pay of Marine Corps (p. 64 of blue print, p. 75 of regular bill), which is not numbered.]

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 1, 7, 9, 13, 24, 25, 26, 37, 38, 39, 40, 43, 46, 47, 52, 56, 57, 58, 61, 64, 76, 77, 88, 89, 91, 92, and 93 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
ALSTON G. DAYTON,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report on each of the amendments of the Senate, viz:

On Nos. 2, 3, 53, 68, 70, 71, 73, 74, 75: Changes name of naval cadets to that of midshipmen.

On No. 4: Authorizes the accounting officers of the Treasury, as proposed by the Senate, to allow in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers payments under the appropriation of emergency fund to civilian employees doing duty at naval stations in our insular possessions during the coming fiscal year and until such time as Congress shall make specific appropriation for the pay of such employees.

On No. 5: Authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, as proposed by the Senate, to pay all civilian employees in our insular possessions a per diem compensation corresponding to their pay while actually employed from the date of their sailing from the United States and while returning to the United States.

On No. 6: Strikes out the appropriation of $13,975, as proposed by the Senate, for renting, heating, and lighting an additional building.

On No. 8: Directs the Secretary of the Navy, as proposed by the Senate, to appoint a board of naval officers to select a site for a naval training station on the Great Lakes and make report to Congress of its action, and to defray the expenses of said board appropriates $5,000.

On No. 77, as to a provision authorizing all examinations for admission to the Naval Academy to be held at Annapolis.

On No. 88, as to an appropriation of $1,500 for improvements at the marine barracks, navy-yard, Boston.

On No. 89, as to changes in the amount of total appropriations for public works, Marine Corps.

On No. 91, as to "Increase of the Navy" and the method of construction of new ships authorized, whether they shall be built by contract or some in Government navy-yards, or the whole subject be left within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

On No. 92, as to the provision requiring the Secretary of the Navy to contract for five more Holland torpedo boats at a cost of $170,000 each, after the acceptance of one of said boats now being built for the Government.

On No. 93, as to a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to have tested any completed submarine boats or boats other than the Holland type, and purchase, in his discretion, one of the same, if found to be equal or superior to the best submarine torpedo boat then in use in the Navy, at a price not to exceed $170,000.

The bill as passed by the Senate appropriated $79,351,238.13, being an increase of $1,731,325 over the amount carried as it was passed by the House. Of this sum the committee of conference recommend that $179,375 be stricken out and that $371,130 be agreed to.

AMERICAN CITIZENS DETAINED BY BRITISH AUTHORITIES AS PRISONERS OF WAR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of June 9, 1902, requesting him, if not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish the House of Representatives with a complete list showing the names of all American citizens (and their residence) who are now detained by the British authorities as prisoners of war, together with information as to what investigation, if any has been made by the State Department concerning the cause of their detention and what action has been taken to secure their release.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 23, 1902.

EPHRAIM H. GALLION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without approval, House bill No. 3309, entitled "An act to remove charge of desertion against Ephraim H. Gallion."

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion standing against Ephraim H. Gallion, late of Company B, Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, as he was never mustered into the United States Service, which was not his fault or neglect, and was refused any pay for his service period.

The records of the War Department show that he was enrolled April 21, 1862, as a private of Company B, Sixth Tennessee Infantry Volunteers; that he was a prisoner of war from September 18 to October 11, 1862; that he was discharged from service on surgeon's certificate of disability February 13, 1863; that he again enlisted August 27, 1863, as a private in Company B, Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry, to serve three years; that he was again captured by the enemy and held as a prisoner of war from March 9 to March 21, 1864, when he was paroled. He subsequently rejoined his company and served with it until September 4, 1864, when he deserted. No later record of him has been found.

While the records of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry are incomplete, and it is impossible to ascertain from them whether Gallion was formally mustered into service as a member of it or not, they show conclusively that he was actually made a soldier in this regiment by being placed on duty in it, and by being clothed and paid by the United States as a soldier.

In an affidavit submitted by Gallion, it is declared that he never received any moneys during his service as a member of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry. A pay roll on file in the office for the Auditor for the War Department shows that on May 13, 1864, at Camp Chase, Ohio, Gallion received from a United States paymaster $105.73, being his pay, at the rate of $13 per month, for eight months and four days from the date of his enlistment.

In view of the facts above set forth I am constrained to withhold my approval.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, June 23, 1902.

Mr. HULL. I move that this message with the accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examened and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13676. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WACHTER also, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had presented this day to the President of the United States for his approval bills of the following titles:

H. R. 3641. An act for the allowance of certain claims for property taken for military purposes within the United States during the war with Spain, reported by the Secretary of War in accordance with the requirements of an item contained in sundry civil appropriation act approved June 6, 1900, authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to investigate and adjust claims against the United States for private property taken and used in the military service within the limits of the United States, etc.;

H. R. 9723. An act correcting the record of Levi Wells;

H. R. 11725. An act to amend section 4139 and section 4314 of the Revised Statutes;

H. R. 4636. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mail;

H. J. Res. 200. Joint resolution amending "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902;

H. R. 15004. An act to authorize the Minneapolis, Superior, St. Paul and Winnipeg Railway Company, of Minnesota, to build and maintain a railway bridge across the Mississippi River; and

H. R. 13204. An act to provide for refunding taxes paid upon legacies and bequests for uses of a religious, charitable, or educational character, for the encouragement of art, etc., under the act of June 13, 1898, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SELBY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MCLAIN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HENRY of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of important business.

PRESIDING OFFICER AT EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. CONNER.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the proclamation of Governor Claiborne, then governor of the Mississippi Territory, exercising the powers of governor-general and intendant of the province of Louisiana; also a little speech which he made on taking charge of the Louisiana territory in 1803. This matter is very short—only three pages.

Mr. LESSLER. We ought to know definitely how much space it is to occupy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to impeach my word? I stated that there are three short pages——

Mr. LESSLER. I simply wanted to understand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD three pages of manuscript which he has described. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The documents referred to are as follows:

Proclamation by his excellency William C. C. Claiborne, governor of the Mississippi territory, exercising the powers of governor-general and intendant of the province of Louisiana.

Whereas by stipulations between the Governments of France and Spain the latter ceded to the former the colony of Louisiana, with the same extent which it had at the date of the above-mentioned treaty in the hands of Spain and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it ought to be after the treaty subsequently entered into between Spain and other states; and

Whereas the Government of France had ceded the same to the United States by a treaty duly ratified, and bearing the date of 30th of April the present year, and the possession of said colony is now in the United States, according to the tenor of the last-mentioned treaty; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States on the 31st day of the present year did enact that, until the expiration of the session of Congress then sitting (unless provisions for the temporary government of the said territories be made by Congress), all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the then existing government of the same shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for the maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the President of the United States has by his commission, bearing the date of 31st day of October, invested me with all the powers and charged me with the several duties heretofore held and exercised by the governor-general and intendent of the province:

I have, therefore, thought fit to issue this my proclamation, making known the premises, and to declare that the government heretofore exercised over the said Province of Louisiana, as well under the authority of Spain as of the French Republic, has ceased, and that of the United States of America is established over the same; that the inhabitants of the same will be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyments of all the immunities, rights, and advantages of citizens of the United States; that, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion which they profess; that all laws and municipal regulations which were in existence at the cessation of the late government remain in full force, and all civil officers charged with their execution, except those whose power has been especially vested in me, and except, also, such officers as have been intrusted with the collection of the revenue, are continued in their function during the pleasure of the governor for the time being, or until provision shall otherwise be made.

And I do hereby exhort and enjoin all the inhabitants and other persons within the said provinces to be faithful and true in their allegiance to the United States, and obedient to the laws and authorities of the same, under full assurance that their just rights will be under the guardianship of the United States, and will be maintained from all violence from without or within.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand.

Given in the city of New Orleans the 20th day of December, 1803, and of the independence of the United States of America the twenty-eighth.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE.

The governor's address to the citizens of Louisiana:

NEW ORLEANS, September 20, 1803.

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF LOUISIANA: On the great and interesting event now finally consummated—an event so dangerous to yourselves and so glorious to the United America—I can not forbear offering you my warmest congratulations. The wise policy of the Consul of France has, by the cession of Louisiana to the United States, secured to you a connection beyond the reach of change and to your posterity the sure inheritance of freedom. The American people receive you as brothers, and will hasten to extend to you a participation in those inestimable rights which have formed the basis of their own unexampled prosperity.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the order of the House, a recess will now be taken until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by Mr. CONNER as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In pursuance of the order previously made, the House will now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2295.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CURRIER in the chair.

PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I do not see present the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs. We on the minority side have used a good deal more time than the majority, and I would much prefer that some gentleman on the other side would use some of the majority time.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, the Chair will recognize any gentleman on the Republican side for ten minutes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. No gentleman desires to speak on that side——

Mr. GIBSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed, he would say to the gentleman from Virginia, that the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs will be here in a moment.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] rose, and I thought he was going to speak.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I rose to make an observation. I will state that there was an agreement between myself and the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs that I should have allotted to me at least thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee for thirty minutes.

[Mr. GIBSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NEVILLE].

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Chairman, the unjust provisions of the pending bill, and the recent developments as to methods of the Administration in the management of governmental affairs, make it the plain duty of every American citizen clothed with legislative authority to raise his voice in warning to the American people.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and in charge of this bill, in his opening address elaborately stated the Republican contention as to the course of the Administration in the Philippine Islands. His first statement was that the blessings of liberty are to be extended to the Filipino, and mind you, Mr. Chairman, he did not limit the scope of the word liberty.

It was not merely to remove the tyrannical hand of Spain; not merely to check the threatening attitude of Mohammedan teachings; not merely to enable the slaves to purchase their freedom at the market price; not merely to quiet the warring factions of the various islands; not merely to deprive the islanders of commercial and social intercourse with their relatives, the Chinese; not merely to protect them from the brutal hand of some foreign power needing more subjects to labor for its royalty, but to give them the blessings of liberty, presumably such liberty as we enjoy; that liberty for which the founders of this Republic fought and whipped the great destroyer of republics; that liberty for which every patriotic heart throbs, and for which every patriot's hand will fight when his native country is assailed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to determine whether the Administration is practicing deception or not we have only to examine the contents of this bill—an Administration measure. The American conception of liberty presents but two phases. One is that our people may enjoy all rights and privileges guaranteed by the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and their laws, with such restraints as may be necessary to protect such rights and privileges. The other is that all other people shall enjoy such rights, privileges, and liberty as they may decree are suitable to their country, habits, and desires, and not in jeopardy of the rights of American citizens.

This bill does not make the Filipino an American citizen. It establishes courts to punish him, but does not guarantee him the right of trial by a jury of his peers. It establishes a government with the rules of which he must comply, and yet gives him no voice in the adoption of such rules nor the right to alter or modify them. It does not give him representation in the Government which legislates to control him, yet it taxes him to support policies which he does not approve. It in no sense gives him the liberty of an American citizen, while it at the same time abrogates his right to the liberty of a foreigner.

Members of the majority say this is not imperialism, but I am constrained to ask, What is it? This bill makes the islands our colonies; gives their people only such liberties as we believe they deserve, and reserves to us the right to increase or curtail those liberties in degree as our varying administrations may be kind or brutal. But, Mr. Chairman, this is enough on this line. Every American citizen knows that our title to the Philippines is no greater than that of King George to the American colonies. And that the attempts to govern without consent and with limited liberties are parallel.

Another contention of the advocates of this bill is that the opponents are equally responsible with the Republicans for the conditions prevailing with respect to our colonies. This contention hangs upon the slender thread that the great Democratic leader with a few of his partisans advocated the ratification of the treaty of Paris. They are indeed hard pushed for some one to share the ignominy of administrative policy since the ratification. Every reading American knows that W. J. Bryan advocated the ratification of the treaty with the avowed object of eliminating Spain as a factor in our efforts to give her colonies involved in the war their independence if they desired it and to end the war. And every man knows, and every fair-minded man will admit, that since the ratification of the treaty every step taken by our Administration leading toward the government of the Filipinos without their consent has been against the protest of W. J. Bryan and all of his partisans and against the protest of all other American citizens who are not under the thumb of the promoters of greed and avarice.

Another contention is that we offer no remedy or satisfactory way out. I think I can suggest to my Republican and Democratic friends a decent way to let go, and that is to negotiate a treaty with the islanders by which they shall remunerate us for our proper expense in trying to secure their liberty, and stand the expense ourselves of our efforts to lord it over them. If they would not agree to this kind of a treaty, we would at least have as much right to insist upon it as upon the enactments we are now providing for their guidance.

But we are told that vested rights have accrued and great property interests developed under our protection, and that we can not justly leave them to the mercy of a doubtful government, but a complete and sufficient answer to that is that time will only increase the difficulty.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss this bill in detail, but its every section discloses an intent to exercise authority and control over those people without their consent, and that means now just what it has disclosed throughout the pages of history—a determination to control the fruits of other people's labor, and arbitrarily take their possessions without adequate compensation. It means national instead of individual slavery.

The greed and avarice of the American is becoming proverbial. He has resorted for gain to every device from conquest to cunning legislation, from fraud and deception to common lying. He utilizes child labor while parents walk the streets in enforced idleness. He placards and advertises his goods "marked down from $4 to $1" to catch the unwary woman looking for bargains.

He manufactures glucose honey, mule-fat butter, and bean coffee, to defraud legitimate producers and necessary consumers in markets where he can not palm off wooden nutmegs and the baser frauds. He advertises for honest laborers and dishonestly exacts a bonus without furnishing the employment. He waters the stock of doubtful corporations to filch the hard-earned mite savings of hired girls. He secures a 50 per cent protective tariff and reduces the wages of his employees 10 per cent. He glories in the enjoyment of free institutions and popular elections and corrals the voters in blocks of five. He writes and publishes false history, to cheat real heroes of the fruits of their victories. He collects funds in trust for a war-stricken and impoverished people and uses it to promote influence in favor of special classes. He garbles and misconstrues the orders of the great emancipator, to his army fighting to free men, as an excuse for the brutality of soldiers fighting to enslave men.

He suppresses the free expression of thought upon public questions as a necessity to retain office, while he denounces the policy of the spoils system as a reward for victory, and it is therefore not strange that he declares his intentions toward the Filipinos as honest and Godly, while the balance of the world looks on horror-stricken.

History does not record a nation of people who retained their liberties long after denying them to others, and unless the people of this country who believe in the common brotherhood of man and possess the finer sensibilities as to equality and justice forge to the front, the American people are likely to be scattered to the uttermost parts of the earth and the name supplant the synonym of another nation for cheat.

It is not difficult for a thoughtful man to see that the corrupt element of this country is in the saddle, and just so sure as disaster follows dishonesty, our people must come to grief. What more evidence of deception do the people need than the continued efforts of the managers of governmental affairs to hide the facts. He who reads the daily papers must note the headlines, "Root can not report the expense," "Moody regrets the leak," "Miles to be retired for exposing Army affairs," "The President deplores the publicity." Let me remind the American people that conclusions and decisions reached as to past matters, by the Army or Navy or any other department of the Government, should be reported to the people if the people are the Government. If the people are not the Government any longer in this country when will the bulldogs be turned loose to keep them out of the front yard?

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I do not intend to seek a renomination for Congress, it is proper that I should, before taking my seat, say something as to other legislation passed and to be passed. A few days ago a bill passed this House increasing the subsidiary coinage and permitting the melting of the standard silver dollar and its coinage into subsidiary money. Were it not for the secrecy and deception marking the path of governmental affairs, this law would be admitted to be a law to decrease the volume of standard or legal-tender money in the interest of the Treasury raiders, who hope to pull that string to again rake in the hard earnings of the people when the trust or combination rope shall break or be hedged about. There is no question but that the increase of subsidiary coin will do some good. It was needed and could have been provided without melting the standard silver dollar, but the decrease of the legal tender money is in furtherance of a long-continued scheme to tighten the grasp of a moneyed aristocracy upon the United States Treasury and eventually to choke it out of existence.

This side of the House is accused of abandoning the silver question, but that is not true as a whole. I am not informed as to the status of Democrats upon the money issue, but presume that, like the Republicans upon the tariff, they are all split up. There is one thing, however, about which I am informed, and that is that every Populist, while he does not believe that bimetalism is a full and complete panacea for the evils besetting the money question, does believe that legal-tender silver at 16 to 1, or any other ratio with gold, is better than bank-note currency, for the reason that it is good going and coming, while bank-note currency is a sure and rapid means to get you into debt, but is unreliable as a means to get you out. We believe that the Government should issue all money; that it should be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and that the promissory note of an individual, of a bank, or other corporation should not be in imitation of money, and should depend for its circulation upon the integrity and standing of the promisor rather than upon legislation in his favor.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that there is an effort to have the people abandon the money question. Each grasping individual desires all other persons to refrain from everything which interferes with his greed. The people are not going to abandon the money question until it is rightly and permanently settled, and prior to that time it is and will be the paramount issue.

A few distinguished gentlemen are trying to unite the Democracy upon an antitrust, anti-imperial, and tariff-reduction platform. These gentlemen are distinguished for at least two reasons. One is that occasionally they have to announce that they are Democrats, and the other is that whenever the money question is agitated, no matter how much trust, tariff, and imperialism are involved, they vote the Republican ticket.

This is conclusive proof that they believe the money question to be paramount, and that their interests are with the classes and not with the masses. A couple of these distinguished gentlemen, formerly known as the firm of "Cleveland & Hill," a few nights ago uttered the encouraging words which are to unite the hosts for the conflict against trusts and imperialism. It will in truth be a huge joke upon the intelligence and sincerity of the Democratic party if it follows the advice of a man who was once elected President by votes in the West because he was for bimetallism, in accordance with the platform, and votes in the East because he was against it.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us see where the advice will lead. Reunited Democracy will resolve to abolish trusts and combines. The Republican President is causing suits to be brought against them. Who will have the best of the argument? The reunited Democracy will resolve against imperialism. The Republicans now do, and will continue to deny, that they favor imperialism. The battle along the whole line will descend to a campaign of personal abuse. The only question involved will be the sincerity of the parties. Each will accuse the other of evasion and misrepresentation, and the average citizen will not know what to believe and will vote according to his view of conditions regardless of causes or issues.

As an evidence that the Republicans are not sincere, we only have to notice that when they throw a crust to the wage-earner they give a whole bakery shop and contents to the millionaire. When they offer us an opportunity to vote for a constitutional amendment to suppress trusts they couple with it a proposition to oppress labor. When they offer us a chance to vote to increase subsidiary money they couple with it a provision to decrease the volume of legal-tender dollars. When they give us a chance to suppress anarchy, which we would gladly do, they couple with it a provision to make certain officers royal and above us, when they are only our equals and employees.

When the Democrats start their great campaign to liberate oppressed labor and throttle devouring trusts, and take under their fostering wing the money trust, the father and mother of all combines and oppression, to enable them to capitalize the procession, the American people will not believe that they are sincere.

No, Mr. Chairman, the American people are not fools. Some are dishonest and cunning; some are honest and trusting, and many are tired and sleepy, but all are ready to avenge a wrong to them when sufficiently rubbed in to make them feel it. They all know that if the Smiths can control the kind and volume of money which the Jones may use in their business that the Smiths can absorb the profits or suppress the business at will. If a few banks can control the kind and volume of money which the people—theoretically the Government—may use in their business, then such banks can and will periodically absorb the profits and suppress such parts of the business as may seem to them desirable. The people are now awakened to the fact that some day not far distant a Rothschilds may develop in this country who can dictate when and where it may engage in war or other enterprises.

I know that some Democrats claim that the protective tariff is the mother of trusts. But I would remind my Democratic friends, and especially those who are ashamed of alliance with Populists, that trusts are each and all the product of concentrated wealth; that a protective tariff is only one means of concentrating wealth in the hands of a few; that railway monopolies, telegraph, telephone, and electric-light franchises, Government contracts, ship subsidies, and a thousand other special privileges are potent factors in the concentration of wealth; but the stockholders of one class of these various enterprises combine as a defensive weapon to put them upon an equal footing with the combination of the others in commerce and trade, while the national-bank trust, controlling as it does the kind and volume of money with which they all do business, is the all-potent factor in the concentration of wealth, and was intended to, and eventually will, absorb the profits and control the business of all other people.

The men who go before the country declaring that they want to abolish trusts and prohibit imperialism, when they at the same time advocate a money system which is a sure breeder of trusts and inevitably creates class distinction, royalty, and vassal, are either idiots or believe other people to be.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the citizenship of this country will soon have leisure in which they can reflect. The South African war is over. May God ameliorate the effect of its result upon human liberty. The Spanish war is over. The Philippine conflict may last hundreds of years, but will never furnish a profitable business to Americans. The people will not much longer consent to toil for the exorbitant price with which to buy home goods, while the manufacturers produce a surplus with which to exploit cheap-labor countries, and this country can not long be prosperous upon a business confined almost entirely for its profits to interest on loaned money and raids on the United States Treasury.

I know the cry from one quarter is "to let well enough alone," but when harvest is over and the little balance of labor now employed is out with their brethren in a strike or lockout the masses will be disgusted with the conditions which make the millionaire say "Let well enough alone," and the wage-earners' babies cry for bread.

If I mistake not, when the bubble bursts and the men with the champagne stomachs and beer pocketbooks fully realize the cause of their undoing, there will be more men in this country with populistic ideas than was ever dreamed of in the philosophy of a reorganizing Democrat or self-confident Republican.

I have not the time to go over in detail the various steps taken by the Republican party to undo the people, but each step was in fraud of the other. When the first step was taken for the overthrow of silver it was stealthily done, and it will always puzzle him who studies political economy to know why our country aided to destroy the value of a product which she produced in abundance and which was not largely produced in other countries. The storm raised by the first step caused the Republicans for many years to pledge by party platform their loyalty to bimetalism; but they cunningly and persistently legislated for its destruction.

The same deceptive course was pursued as to the tariff. At first protection was invoked to foster infant industries, but the more the industries grew the more they could digest and the more they were fed. Now they are protected that they may rob the home people to enable them to compete for trade abroad. The same deception is visible in the varied legislation to do away with greenbacks and crops out in all laws relating to quasi-public corporations and monopolies. But for an unparalleled record of deception, the course of the party in power toward the Filipinos is presented to the public view. To go into detail would string these remarks out as long as the moral law.

It is sufficient to state that while the Administration persistently denied that Aguinaldo and his followers were recognized as allies, the letters of our consuls at Hongkong and Manila, as afterwards published in Senate Document No. 62, showed that they were; that while the Administration repeatedly declared that the war in the Philippines was conducted with humanity and mercy, its suppressed reports and evidence afterwards disclosed the most hideous and brutal torture, by official direction, that can be found disgracing the pages of ancient or modern history.

I presume we may tread out the life of innumerable insects and the harm to us not being visible pass it by as a trivial matter, but when we wantonly torture out the life of a weaker humanity, and then to mitigate our ignominy stand over graves where we should cast the green twig of regret, but instead rekindle the flame of sectional hate, God pity the man or woman who can look on and applaud.

But we are told that we are becoming a world power. Oh, shame for the ambition. Pharaoh, Herod, Tiberius, Nero, Cæsar, Alexander the Great, and Napoleon, were all great world powers, and history lines their pathway with victims that are now visible only by representations in the chamber of horrors. God grant that my country shall not continue to enlarge such chamber.

I know we are building great battle ships, but the incentive for building is more in the profits on construction than the need of the boats. If the conduct of the Administration is an indication, it is almost impossible now to get men to man the ships we already have. Whether this is the result of the conduct of recent war, or because men do not care to fight for other men's gain, I can not say, but the fact remains. I know an estimable lady and worthy husband of this city who have for the past week bent all their energies to secure the release of their schoolboy from the ship Franklin, and the lady the last time I saw her was wringing her hands with tears streaming down her face because the Department refused to let him go.

The letter containing the refusal said he was a likely, bright boy; was needed, and would add to the personnel of the Navy. The mother pleaded with the commander of the ship at Norfolk; she pleaded with the Secretary of the Navy, and two gentlemen, respectable enough to be Congressmen, pleaded for her with the President, and all received a deaf ear.

There is no more reason in law, and surely not in morals, why a recruiting officer for the Navy can make a binding contract with a child without its parents' consent than that others can do so. This boy, Willie Morton, is not yet through the high school. Temporarily away from home and probably having the ambition to be a Dewey or a Schley, without judgment and experience sufficient to contract for his future, the recruiting officer enlisted him. His parents were not consulted, they did not consent, and did not know of it in time to prevent.

I know of another instance where the heartaches are just as great and the man is retained, not even permitted to purchase his discharge, because the Navy can not spare him; yet an aged mother with an afflicted daughter is in continuous grief because of the heartlessness and the want of humanity shown by our naval officers. If I mistake not the temper of the American people, some day haughty officials will be taught that they are not royalty, and the rights of American citizens will be respected.

I was once a Republican. It was many years ago, and my consolation is that that party came into power because it advocated man's humanity to man, as a means to produce the greatest good to the greatest number, and I got out of the party when I foresaw that it would go out of power advocating man's inhumanity to man, as a means to produce the greatest misery to the greatest number. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, outside of the proposition that any legislation looking to the permanent retention of the Philippines is wrong, I think there are many serious objections to the bill which is now under consideration. The bill in section 7, page 63, is as follows:

That whenever the existing insurrection in the Philippine Islands shall have ceased and a condition of general and complete peace shall have been established therein and the fact shall be certified to the President by the Commission, the President, upon being satisfied thereof, shall authorize the Commission to call and the Commission shall call a general election, etc.

Now, then, that is certainly putting a local self-government and the action by a legislature selected by themselves of the Filipinos in the dim and distant future. Gentlemen on the other side seem to go into hysterics when any member upon this side ventures to prophesy that the people in after years will get tired of the Republican misrule and will elect a Democratic President and have a Democratic Administration.

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. LESSLER. Will the gentleman state if he has calculated how far off that is going to be? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, Mr. Chairman; that will be just this side of the time when the Filipinos will have a legislature of their own and local self-government. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] Whenever that comes you may expect the other to come, and whenever the gentlemen on the other side commence to prophesy as to when the war in the Philippines will end and when the rebellion will end, they always tell us that we now have peace and that there is no such thing as war, and when they begin their statements along that line they discount, I think, any declarations or prophecies that the most sanguine Democrat could make of what may occur in the future to his party. Now, I say that this is put, and I believe purposely put, by those gentlemen for the purpose of using it before the people in the next election.

I do not believe that they expect, and I do not believe that they promise in good faith, that the Filipinos will ever have a legislature until the carpetbaggers have first sucked the lifeblood from the treasury of that country. They do not intend it, because the Commission itself says that it should be done by January, 1904; but the committee in their wisdom say that they will not give any definite time at all, but will put it whenever general and complete peace has been established therein and that fact shall be certified to the President by the Commission.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that when they put that in the bill they did it knowing that they did not intend that peace should ever come to those islands or that the fact of peace should ever be certified. No; it was because of this that they put into the very bowels of the bill itself a contingency that they believe and that they know will never happen to these people, because they do not intend that they shall ever have local self-government, and hence they never intend that they shall ever have peace.

Now, the majority of the committee, I suppose, facetiously refer to the legislative limitations in the bill as a bill of rights. A bill of rights, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, would be a misnomer without that great pearl of every bill of rights—the right of local self-government and a trial by jury; and nowhere in this so-called bill of rights that these gentlemen speak of, and that they refer to all the way through in their report, is one single thing in regard to the trial by jury. Here is the language of the bill:

SEC. 10. That no law shall be enacted in said islands which shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person therein the equal protection of the laws.

That in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to be heard by himself and counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to have a speedy and public trial, to meet the witnesses face to face, and to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf.

Now, compare that with the Constitution, from which part of it is taken, and see how incongruous that bill of rights is without something else that is found in the Constitution, and ought to be in this law:

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, that declaration in favor of jury trial is conspicuous by its absence all through this bill. Then, another thing that is absent and that they do not intend shall be there. That is Article V of the Constitution, which is right in line with the other:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger.

Now, those are two of the essentials that are left out of what these gentlemen, as I think, humorously designate as the bill of rights.

But there is another omission that is perhaps as significant as these two, and that is Article VII of the Constitution, which says that—

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will read, not between the lines but in the very body of this bill, I believe you will find the reason for these significant omissions. You will find it in the further declaration along in that bill which only allows to an individual who desires to enter his little home 40 acres of land, and yet allows corporations that go there to buy from the Philippine government, to buy almost 5,000 acres. With such privileges as that, and with the partnership existing between the Republican party and the corporations, is it wonderful that while they are singling out for these corporations such monopolistic powers as obtaining 5,000 acres of land, that the corporations should say to the gentlemen who propose this bill, "You must not allow the juries of that country to try their neighbors' rights or our rights in the courts of the country."

Mr. Chairman, not only that, but they go on with numerous details of that kind which, it seems to me, are utterly inconsistent with a republican government. Among other things, they say—

That no person shall be imprisoned for debt arising out of or founded on contract, express or implied.

And in another section—

That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted shall exist in said islands.

And yet in the very beginning of the section in regard to legislative enactments they say:

After such election all the legislative power heretofore conferred on the Philippine Commission in all that part of said islands not inhabited by the Moros or other non-Christian tribes shall be vested in a legislature consisting of two houses—the Philippine Commission and the Philippine assembly.

For the purpose of attempting to deceive the people to whom they will be amenable in the coming election they say, "Why, here we have abolished slavery in the Philippine Islands. We say there shall be no imprisonment for debt;" and yet but a few years ago there was a treaty made with one of the sultans of the Sulu group, in which both slavery and polygamy were permitted to continue.

In order to escape that; in order to continue and to tolerate this most iniquitous system of slavery, they have said that this declaration against slavery shall not apply to the Moros and non-Christian tribes, because they shall not be controlled by this legislative body. It is apparent, it is so apparent, it seems to me to be transparent what it was done for. Imprisonment for what? You take the report of the committee itself, and it gives the testimony of Governor Taft before that committee, and in that testimony Governor Taft says there are about 250,000 slaves held by these people, and most of that slavery was brought about for debt. Yet, in order to go before the people with the plausible assumption that we will not allow imprisonment for debt, and will abolish slavery in these islands, they insert this provision, while they do not attempt to abrogate the treaty which allows slavery for debt, the very worst kind of imprisonment.

Mr. Chairman, as one of the incidents of four years of the bloodiest war that ever befell any nation, 5,000,000 ignorant negroes were invested with the right to vote and to sit upon the juries of our country, and yet by solemn treaty with a Sultan of one of our new possessions slavery is recognized and permitted. Quoting further from the testimony of Governor Taft, the committee say in their report:

We are told by the datos that they (the slaves) were there as slaves for debt, and that was the chief method by which they became slaves; that any slave could redeem himself by the payment of that debt, but that the obligation to pay the debt continued from father to son and to the entire family.

Here we not only find slavery for debt, but a slavery transmitted as a heritage from father to son; yea, and to collateral relatives.

The committee's bill of rights pretends to forbid slavery and involuntary servitude except on conviction for crime. This the majority admits in their report to be but "sounding brass," because the Supreme Court in the insular cases has held that the thirteenth amendment, prohibiting slavery in the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction, is in force in the Philippines. But it will be noted that the very provisions of the bill, as before stated, except non-Christian tribes and Moros from the legislative control provided for by the bill. Plainly, this is put in there for the purpose of enabling the Moros to retain the rights General Bates gave them in the treaty, among which were those of owning slaves and practicing polygamy.

Again, we have a statute which forbids polygamy in our Territories and other possessions, and yet for three long years we have been living under a treaty which not only permits this violation of the laws of God and man, but these very datos who practice it are in the employ of our Government, and the hard earnings of American taxpayers go to support their unholy harems and lend the moral and financial support of a Christian people to practices which shock the heart of every virtuous man and woman in our great Republic.

This, Mr. Chairman, is part of the stock in trade that we are getting by the policy of this Republican Administration, and this bill carefully refrains from any interference with it whatever.

What is it costing us? You find your answer in the new-made graves of 10,000 brave American soldiers who fell on the field of duty in obedience to the orders of those who care not for the father's groans and the mother's tears for the soldier boy who sleeps upon a foreign soil. You find your answer at St. Elizabeth's Insane Hospital, near this city, whose gloomy halls are trod by those who lost their reason beneath the torrid suns of Luzon, and now suffer a living death because of the greed for gain and lust for power of those whose callous hearts have no sympathetic throb for brave men who went to answer duty's call. One gallant boy from my own district is within those walls, and but a few days ago the doctor told me his was almost a hopeless case. Do you believe the aged parents of that boy would for one moment think that every Filipino upon the thousand isles could recompense their darkened hearts for the loss of this poor boy?

What else is it costing us? The appropriations urged upon Congress at every session for the support of our armies in ths Philippines answer by footing up more than two hundred millions of money wrung from the hands of the toilers of our land.

But what have we gained? We have gained those who in religion, many of them, follow the crescent of Mohammed and not the cross of the Nazarene. We have gained those who believe that human slavery is right, and who hate the sanctity of the marriage vow. We have gained those who, according to the contention of gentlemen on the other side, so despise the rules of civilized warfare that our own officers are debauched into an emulation of all the cruelties of their foes. We have gained the privilege of making war upon women and children, and trying to excuse it by declaring that boys struggling for liberty must be shot down like beasts of prey.

Gentlemen cry out in their desperation that we are making war upon the American soldier. Against the brave soldier, the man behind the gun, I have not a word to say. For him I have only praise. But for the satrap who declares the policy of death to children and destruction to the homes of defenseless women I have the utmost contempt. With what sneers was the very name of Butcher Weyler uttered by all who read of his brutal deeds but a few years ago, and yet they are imitated by Butcher Smith, and the barbarities of Butcher Smith were upheld by a Republican leader on the floor of this House not two days ago, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] declared that Smith was entirely within the rules of civilized warfare when giving the order to kill boys over 10 years of age. This gentleman further says that children of 10 years old, "if capable of fighting or if they are taken with arms in their hands, should be treated exactly in the way they were." This shows plainly what Democrats have all the time contended was true, that not the Army, but the powers behind the Army, were responsible for acts of cruelty that would make Butcher Weyler hang his head in shame.

The excuse of gentlemen on the other side of the House for the barbarities committed there in the name of liberty is that these boys often fight against the invaders of their homes and will not lie supinely upon their backs while the car of American oppression crushes out the last spark of liberty from their hearts. If the boys have that kind of courage, when will we ever be able to suppress a rebellion backed up by the fathers of such sons? How many brave American soldiers will bite the dust in far-off Luzon before that kind of valor is repressed?

Mr. Chairman, the water cure and such cruelties, practiced to make men betray their neighbors, is barbarous and unchristian, but its evil to the Filipinos is not near so great as its evil effects upon ourselves. By seeking to apologize for it those who are its apologists hold our vaunted American civilization up to the scorn and contempt of all the nations of the world.

The hardest stab of all is that which religion receives in the house of its so-called friends when in religion's name these barbarities are committed. They tell us that it is manifest destiny; that the hand of Providence is in it. Providence in the butchery of human victims! Providence in the flames that burn the humble roof from the home that shelters women and children! Providence in tortures applied to men to force a betrayal of their own brethren! Providence carrying sword and torch and leaving death and ruin in its wake! What providence ever winked at such as these? Contrast that providence with the teachings of Him who stood upon the troubled waters and said, "Peace, be still!" Contrast that kind of providence with the life of Him whose natal hour was heralded by angels to Judæan shepherds upon Judæan hills and beneath Judæan skies, when earth and heaven resounded with the acclamation, "Peace on earth, good will to men!"

I am glad to know that organizations of Christian ministers and Christian people all over the United States have raised such a cry against the fiendish barbarities being practiced in the name of civilized warfare, that they are making their voices heard even by the deaf ears of a rough-rider President. The following is an extract from "An appeal of New York ministers to ministers of the United States:"

We, the undersigned ministers of religion, appeal to our brethren of all denominations throughout the United States to protest against the conditions in the Philippines revealed by testimony before the Senate Committee on Affairs in the Philippine Islands, from which the following are extracts:

Testimony of Edward J. Davis.

Q. When did you first arrive at Igbaras?
A. I had charge of that detachment at Igbaras. I do not remember the date I went over there.
Q. About how large a town is Igbaras?
A. I should say about 10,000 inhabitants.
Q. You may state whether or not the president or mayor of Igbaras was taken into custody?
A. He was.
Q. By whose order was he arrested?
A. Orders from Captain Glenn.
Q. After he was taken there what was done with him?
A. He was taken out into a big hall in the convent there, his clothes were all taken off, his hands were tied behind him, and he was asked for information in regard to runners being sent up into the mountains; asked if the scouts had arrived there. He would not give this information, so they took him to the water tank. It was a tank holding about a hundred gallons of water. They held him under the faucet, and he was made to take this water into his mouth at the command of Captain Glenn.
Q. How was his mouth kept open?
A. It was kept open with a stick, but I can not describe just how the stick was, because they had their hands over his mouth most of the time.
Q. After he was filled up with water, what else was done with him?
A. After they filled him up with water he swelled away up and these two soldiers would roll the water out of him. They had an interpreter over him, and they asked if he would tell what information they were after. He told some, and then after they released him and he had walked away and they were going out in the mountains somewhere and they got downstairs, they wanted further information out of him in regard to these runners going out into the mountains, and he would not give it. So they took him down right there, and they took a syringe and squirted water up his nostrils. He would not give the information, and they put salt in the water. Then he was willing to tell.
Q. Was he thrown down the last time?
A. Yes; his clothes were not taken off, but he was thrown down on the outside of the convent.
Q. You say there were about 10,000 people in this town of Igbaras?
A. Yes, sir; the town was burned.
Q. How soon was it burned?
A. After the column went up into the mountains, and about half an hour after they returned the town was burned.
Q. Do you know by whose order it was burned?
A. By order of Captain Glenn.
Q. Were there any houses left unburned?
A. Yes, sir; there were, I should judge, 15 houses left in the town.
Q. What became of the occupants of those houses that were burned?
A. They were driven out into the lots.
Q. Were they men, women, and children?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were there a good many women and children?
A. Yes; there were.

This, Mr. Chairman, is but a part of the testimony of one witness before the Senate committee. There were many more, and the details of torture are equally as shocking as those which I have quoted.

Then is it surprising that these devout ministers should close their petition to their brethren with these words?

We urgently beg our brethren in the ministry to inform themselves fully in regard to the position of the United States in the Philippine Islands in order that they may advise the American people as to their duty in regard to this matter.

But for the investigations demanded, but only partly received, by Democratic members of Congress, this carnival of crime would have gone unnoticed by the President and War Department till the weapon of the butcher would become dry for lack of a victim. The enormity of this matter, Mr. Chairman, to a large degree is the fact that men with Christian parents, raised beside Christian altars, going forth from the doors of Christian churches, are compelled to perpetrate these barbarities or else be court-martialed for disobedience of orders.

Yet when investigation revealed the secrets of these enormities, those who are the coconspirators in crime with the officers who ordered them, raise their blood-stained hands in holy horror and say "Hush, you must not say a word or repeat these stories, for if you do you are abusing the Army."

Because we have told the fathers and mothers of these men the crimes which their sons are forced to commit, when their sons themselves would not dare to tell them, we are charged with being Copperheads and traitors.

Let the blood of the murdered victims in both armies in the far-away Philippines cry aloud till the voters at the ballot box shall whip the money changers from the temple of American liberty and drive those who barter human blood for commerce from the high places of power and oppression. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the people of the country are to be congratulated that at last they have a President in the White House who has found a way by which the trusts can be successfully suppressed. Recently one of the great trusts of which the American people can boast decided to put up the price of one of our principal food products. I refer to the beef trust. The advance in the price of this necessity of life aroused the indignation of people in all parts of the country. In response to this popular protest the President of the United States instructed his officers to institute proceedings in our courts for the purpose of suppressing the beef trust.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the President is an able man. He is surrounded with as able legal advisers as there are in the country, and the very fact that he has ordered this suit ought to be a sufficient guaranty that the Sherman law is sufficiently effective to accomplish the result desired. Yes, the President has ordered the suppression of the beef trust. There appears to be no doubt about the existence of this trust. It has put up prices. It has oppressed the poor. It is making money out of the hunger of humanity. The poor are its first victims, starvation is its customer. It levies tribute upon the laboring man.

From the tenement houses come its largest revenues. It is merciless; it is without pity; but, thank God, the oppressed have a friend. The President of the United States is their friend. The greatest ruler of the greatest nation on earth is their friend. The most powerful man in the world, save one, is their friend. They have a friend in the strenuous one. This great man has ordered the suppression of this trust and he has the law behind him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the trust is not suppressed it is no fault of the law, for the Republicans in Congress by refusing to amend the law admit its sufficiency, and it surely can not be the fault of the President, for he has declared very emphatically upon this subject. In his message to the New York legislature on the 3d day of June, 1900, he declared that—

> The man who by swindling or wrong-doing acquires great wealth for himself at the expense of his fellow, stands as low morally as any predatory mediæval nobleman, and is a more dangerous member of society. Any law, and any method of construing the law, which will enable the community to punish him, either by taking away his wealth or by imprisonment, should be welcomed.

And so I repeat, that the country is to be congratulated, for the antitrust law is to be enforced. The suit has been ordered, the violation of law is admitted, and Theodore Roosevelt is President of the United States. Devoutly should the American people thank God for the advent of this auspicious hour. [Applause.]

But while the President is in the business of suppressing trusts, it might be well to remind him that, at the time he ordered the suppression of the beef trust 163 other great industrial trusts were already in existence, and for years has been regulating prices as they saw fit.

In his message to the New York legislature the President again declared that "where a trust becomes a monopoly the State has an immediate right to interfere;" and now that the Sherman Act has been violated of course the nation has a right to interfere. Nobody denies, so far as I know, that these 163 trusts are monopolies pure and simple. Nobody denies that they have been regulating prices. The American Steel and Wire Company put up the price of barbed wire from $1.75 per hundred to $3.50 per hundred.

The American Tin Plate Company advanced the price of tin nearly 100 per cent. The paris green trust put up the price of paris green, which is used by our tobacco farmers, more than 100 per cent. The anthracite coal trust has advanced the price of coal. The sugar trust puts up the price of sugar whenever it sees fit. The nail trust, within the last five years, has advanced the price of nails nearly 100 per cent. Every consumer in the country knows these statements to be true. The President must know that they are true, and while he is in the business of suppressing trusts he will no doubt order the prosecution of every one of these trusts.

The prices of the following food products are largely regulated by the trusts which manufacture them, to wit: Sugar, flour, starch, oatmeal, rice, manufactured biscuits, condensed milk, vinegar, certain kind of meat, baking powder, and ice. The price of paper is largely regulated by the trust. The price of thread, rope, twine, carpets, and wool products are almost absolutely fixed by the trust. The price of coffins, in which humanity is put away to its last resting place, is fixed by the trust. The price of school furniture is fixed by the trust. The prices of almost all building materials are fixed by the trust.

The prices of hoops and chains are fixed by the trust. In the President's own State, while he was governor of that State, the price of ice (one of the greatest blessings which civilization has evolved) was absolutely fixed by the trust. In short, Mr. Chairman, the price of a majority of the manufactured necessaries of life is fixed by the trust, but the people of the country are certainly to be congratulated. Theodore Roosevelt is President, and he has ordered the prosecution of the beef trust. The beef trust must go, and after the beef trust then the other trusts must be suppressed, for Theodore Roosevelt is a strenuous man, and he has the law behind him. [Applause.]

No, Mr. Chairman, the trusts have nothing to fear from this Administration. The beef trust will not be suppressed. The suit which the President ordered will not terminate until after the November election. When it comes to a hearing some defect will be found in the law which will save the trust from destruction. The suit will be kept pending until after the ides of November, and then it will die or it will disappear from the docket in some way and the beef trust will still be found doing business at the same old stand.

A Republican President can not fight the trust in the very nature of things. The Republican party can not fight the trust because the Republican party is the trusts and the trusts are the Republican party. For the Republican party to fight the trusts would simply be the trusts fighting themselves. They would simply be committing suicide. The creature is never greater than the creator. Mr. Roosevelt can not fight the trusts because his party draws life from them. But for trusts he might be a private citizen to-day. He might simply be plain Colonel Roosevelt, Rough Rider, but private citizen. A change of less that 100,000 votes even in 1900, properly distributed, would have left him at home.

This last proposition to prosecute the beef trust is a mere comedy which will simply amuse the nation. Mark the prediction, Mr. Chairman, the beef trust will not be suppressed. Not one of the 163 trusts, which live upon the poverty and necessities of the people will be suppressed. Certainly not while Theodore Roosevelt is President of the United States and the Republican party is in power.

The Sherman law has accomplished only one thing. It has prevented laboring men from entering into an agreement to strike for higher wages. It has done that and that alone. Nobody supposed it was passed for that purpose, but Judge Woods construed it that way, and ordered Eugene Debbs to jail. The Sherman law does not prevent the huge corporations from combining to put up the prices of food which sustain the laboring man, but it does prevent the laboring man from uniting with his fellow to advance the wages of his toil.

I have felt constrained, Mr. Chairman, to submit these remarks, because I believe that this prosecution of the beef trust, ordered by a Republican President and pressed by a Republican prosecutor, will wind up in a roaring farce. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to discuss the Philippine question to-night, nor will I use the time so graciously yielded me by the gentleman from Virginia altogether for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, this afternoon, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] was making an address to the House upon this bill, and for some reason, I know not what, except to follow the example of another distinguished Republican, Mr. Blaine, who, many years ago, made somewhat of the same kind of a speech, I endeavored to secure the floor, but could not. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], refusing to be interrupted, made a statement that the prisoners in the Confederate prisons during the late civil war suffered inhumanities and barbarities, and thereby the death rate which resulted in those prisons was greater than the death rate of the Confederate prisoners confined in Northern prisons.

I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, and the country, I apprehend, had hoped, that when a distinguished Georgian, Benjamin H. Hill, in this House in 1876, replied to a like attack on the part of the then distinguished and now lamented James G. Blaine, who made an assault upon the people of the South for political purposes; I say I had hoped, and the country had hoped, that that question was settled forever, and that no man thereafter would undertake to make an assertion so little sustained by the truth of history or the official records of both Governments as that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania asserted this afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, it is because of the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made that assertion, and I apprehend is endeavoring to seek renomination and reelection by a resort to this kind of politics and this kind of political speech, that I feel called upon and shall use the time allowed to me by the gentleman from Virginia in refuting that statement. I undertook, during the time that he occupied the floor, to interrupt him, but he saw I had the record, and waived me aside and declined to be interrupted. History will eventually be written truly; but we have enough of history already written, and written by officers of the United States, to disprove the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. On the 19th of July, 1866, Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War of the United States, made a report to Congress in which it appears that of all the prisoners in the hands of the Confederates during the four years there died in all of the Confederate prisons 22,246, while of the Confederate prisoners held by the United States there died in prison 26,576.

Mr. Chairman, I am the son of a Confederate officer who for twelve months was confined in a Federal prison. I would not mention the fact except I know from his own lips what hardships he endured. They were incident to war, probably; some that he endured were. I know this to be a fact, because I received it from his lips, that in the prison at Hilton Head for thirty days Confederate soldiers then in that prison were fed daily upon a pint of musty meal and a salt cucumber pickle as a day's ration. That is all they had. I know from his lips that it was a thing which they rejoiced at when they could see a negro guard on the prison wall from whom they could implore and beg something additional to that sparse ration meted out to them.

I know also that General Sherman, when he learned of the treatment of these prisoners, demanded that they should be properly fed. I know these facts from the lips of a Confederate officer and a Confederate soldier who endured them. I would never have mentioned them here but for the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] that in the Confederate prisons barbarities and iniquities were practiced. The Surgeon-General of the United States Army, Barnes, made a report of the whole number of prisoners that were captured and held by the Confederates was 270,000, and we also find from that official report that the whole number of Confederate prisoners captured and held in prison by the Federal authorities was only 220,000. Of the 270,000 Federal prisoners in Confederate prisons there died 22,246, or less than 9 per cent, Of the 220,000 Confederate prisoners in Federal prisons there died 26,576, or more than 12 per cent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will allow me, where did he get those figures?

Mr. BARTLETT. From the report of Surgeon-General Barnes, of the United States Army, and the report of Secretary of War Stanton, of the United States, made July 19, 1866. You can get them from the official documents of this Government and of the Confederate Government.

But more than that, the records will show that time and time again the Confederate officials repeatedly, earnestly sought to induce the Federal authorities to exchange prisoners, but their efforts were in vain.

I have and will insert in my remarks the proof that it was refused by General Grant himself, and this is borne out by the statement and testimony of Gen. Benjamin F. Butler and the Assistant Secretary of War, Charles A. Dana, upon the ground that a Confederate prisoner was as good as a dead one, because in exchange for a Federal prisoner he would return to the ranks and become an active soldier against the United States, while, he said, one-half the Federal prisoners in Confederate prisons, if exchanged and returned, will never go into the Army again, and none of them will until after they have had a furlough of thirty or sixty days.

Now, I desire to call attention to that statement by Mr. Charles A. Dana. He was the Assistant Secretary of War. He said in an editorial in the New York Sun in 1876:

> The fact is unquestionable that while the Confederates desired to exchange prisoners, to send our men home and to get back their own, General Grant steadily and strenuously resisted such an exchange. While, in his opinion the prisoners in our hands were well fed, and were in better condition than when they were captured, our prisoners in the South were ill-fed, and would be restored to us too much exhausted by famine and disease to form a fair set-off against the comparative vigorous men who would be given in exchange. "It is hard on our men held in Southern prisons" said Grant, in an official communication, "not to exchange them; but it is humane to those left in the ranks to fight our battles. If we commence a system of exchanges which liberates all prisoners taken, we will have to fight on until the whole South is exterminated. If we hold those caught, they count for no more than dead men." "I did not," he said, on another occasion, "deem it justifiable or just to reinforce the enemy; and an immediate resumption of exchanges would have had that effect, without any corresponding benefit."
> This evidence must be taken as conclusive. It proves that it was not the Confederate authorities who insisted on keeping our prisoners in distress, want, and disease, but the commander of our own armies. We do not say that his reason for this course was not valid; but it was not Jefferson Davis, or any subordinate or associate of his, who should now be condemned for it. We were responsible ourselves for the continued detention of our captives in misery, starvation, and sickness in the South.
> Moreover, there is no evidence whatever that it was practicable for the Confederate authorities to feed our prisoners any better than they were fed, or to give them better care and attention than they received. The food was insufficient; the care and attention were insufficient, no doubt; and yet the condition of our prisoners was not worse than that of the Confederate soldiers in the field, except in so far as the condition of those in prison must of necessity be worse than that of men who are free and active outside.
> Again, in reference to those cases of extreme suffering and disease, the photographs of whose victims were so extensively circulated among us toward the end of the war, Mr. Davis makes, it seems to us, a good answer. Those very unfortunate men were not taken from prisons, but from Confederate hospitals, where they had received the same medical treatment as was given to sick and wounded Confederate soldiers. The fact mentioned by Mr. Davis, that while they had 60,000 more prisoners of ours than we had of theirs, the number of Confederates who died in our prisons exceeded by 6,000 the whole number of Union soldiers who died in Southern prisons, though not entirely conclusive, since our men were generally better fed and in better health than theirs, still furnishes a strong support to the position that, upon the whole, our men were not used with greater severity or subjected to greater privations than were inevitable in the nature of the case. Of this charge, therefore, of cruelty to prisoners, so often brought against Mr. Davis, and reiterated by Mr. Blaine in his speech, we think he must be held altogether acquitted.

But surely what General Grant has said on this subject is entitled to consideration and should be accepted, at least by those who were opposed to the Confederates, as the truth.

On January 11, 1865, General Grant, in his testimony before the Committee on the Conduct of the War," said:

> I will confess that if our men who are prisoners in the South were really well taken care of, suffering nothing except a little privation of liberty, then, in a military point of view, it would not be good policy for us to exchange, because every man they get back is forced right into the army at once, while that is not the case with our prisoners when we receive them. In fact, the half of our returned prisoners will never go into the Army again, and none of them will until they have had a furlough of thirty or sixty days. Still, the fact of their suffering as they do is a reason for making this exchange as rapidly as possible. * * *
> I did not deem it advisable or just to the men who had to fight our battles to reenforce the enemy with thirty or forty thousand disciplined troops at that time. An immediate resumption of exchanges would have had that effect without giving us corresponding benefits. The suffering said to exist among our prisoners South was a powerful argument against the course pursued, and I so felt it.

On August 18, 1864, General Grant sent from City Point the following dispatch to Gen. B. F. Butler, the commissioner of the United States for the exchange of prisoners:

> CITY POINT, August 18, 1864.
> To GENERAL BUTLER:
> I am satisfied that the chief object of your interview, besides having the proper sanction, meets with my entire approval. I have seen from Southern papers that a system of retaliation is going on in the South which they keep from us and which we should stop in some way. On the subject of exchange, however, I differ from General Hitchcock. It is hard on our men held in Southern prisons not to exchange them. but it is humanity to those left in the ranks to fight our battles. Every man released on parole, or otherwise, becomes an active soldier against us at once, either directly or indirectly. If we commence a system of exchange which liberates all prisoners taken, we will have to fight on until the whole South is exterminated. If we hold those caught they amount to no more than dead men. At this particular time to release all rebel prisoners North would insure Sherman's defeat and would compromise our safety here.
> U. S. GRANT, Lieutenant-General.

Gen. B. F. Butler stated before the committee of Congress known as "the Committee on the Conduct of the War" as follows:

> Mr. Ould left on March 31, 1864, with the understanding that I would get authority and information from my Government by which all disputed points could be adjusted and would then confer with him further, either meeting him at City Point or elsewhere for that purpose. In the meantime, exchanges of sick and wounded and special exchanges should go on.
> General Grant visited Fortress Monroe on April 1, being the first time I ever met him. To him the state of the negotiations as to exchange were verbally communicated, and most emphatic directions were received from the Lieutenant-General not to take any step by which another able-bodied man should be exchanged until further orders from him. * * *

I might pile up evidence on evidence by the statements of Confederate officers and the statements of Federal officials before Congressional committees corroborating this statement of the Assistant Secretary of War, Dana. Why, as a last resort, there was sent by the Confederate government a delegation taken from the Federal prisoners at Andersonville to Washington to plead their own cause before the Federal authorities to be exchanged. It was of no avail. They were not permitted to see the authorities nor to be heard, and they returned, carrying back the sad tidings that their Government held out no hope of their relief.

I have also the testimony and statement before the "Congressional reconstruction committee of the commander in chief of the Confederate armies"—that leader of the Confederate armies whose word, wherever it was given in this country or the world over, will be accepted as absolute truth; a man whose character as a gentleman, a soldier, a statesman and Christian, and a citizen stands as high as that of any man the world ever produced; a man whose sword is as stainless as that of any cavalier that ever lived or died or fought for a glorious cause; a man who stands at the head in the impartial histories written of that great conflict, as foremost, and the incomparable leader among all the gallant captains engaged in that great struggle. I refer to Robert E. Lee, who led the Confederate armies to victories, and finally, without a blemish on his name or sword, surrendered at Appomattox. [Applause.]

The following is an extract from the sworn testimony of Gen. Robert E. Lee before the Congressional Reconstruction Committee:

Q. (By Mr. Howard.) I wish to inquire whether you had any knowledge of the cruelties practiced toward the Union prisoners at Libby Prison and on Belle Isle?

A. I never knew that any cruelty was practiced, and I have no reason to believe that it was practiced. I can believe, and have reason to believe, that privations may have been experienced by the prisoners, because I know that provision and shelter could not be provided for them.

Q. Were you not aware that the prisoners were dying from cold and starvation?

A. I was not.

Q. Did these scenes come to your knowledge at all?

A. Never. No report was ever made to me about them. There was no call for any to be made. I did hear—it was mere hearsay—that statements had been made to the war department, and that everything had been done to relieve them that could be done, even finally so far as to offer to send them to some other points—Charleston was one point named—if they would be received by the United States authorities and taken to their homes; but whether this is true or not I do not know.

Q. And of course you know nothing of the scenes of cruelty about which complaints have been made at those places (Andersonville and Salisbury)?

A. Nothing in the world, as I said before. I suppose they suffered for want of ability on the part of the Confederate States to supply their wants. At the very beginning of the war I knew that there was suffering of prisoners on both sides, but as far as I could I did everything in my power to relieve them and to establish the cartel which was agreed upon

Q. It has been frequently asserted that the Confederate soldiers feel more kindly toward the Government of the United States than any other people of the South. What are your observations on that point?

A. From the Confederate soldiers I have heard no expression of any other opinion. They looked upon the war as a necessary evil and went through it. I have seen them relieve the wants of Federal soldiers on the field. The orders always were that the whole field should be treated alike. Parties were sent out to take the Federal wounded as well as the Confederate, and the surgeons were told to treat the one as they did the other. These orders given by me were respected on every field.

Q. Do you think that the good feeling on their part toward the rest of the people has continued since the close of the war?

A. I know nothing to the contrary. I made several efforts to exchange the prisoners after the cartel was suspended. I do not know to this day which side took the initiative. I know there were constant complaints on both sides. I merely know it from public rumors. I offered to General Grant, around Richmond, that we should ourselves exchange all the prisoners in our hands. There was a communication from the Christian Commission, I think, which reached me at Petersburg, and made application to me for a passport to visit all the prisoners South. My letter to them I suppose they have.

I told them I had not that authority; that it could only be obtained from the war department at Richmond, but that neither they nor I could relieve the sufferings of the prisoners; that the only thing to be done for them was to exchange them, and, to show that I would do whatever was in my power, I offered them to send to City Point all the prisoners in Virginia and North Carolina over which my command extended, provided they returned an equal number of mine, man for man. I reported this to the War Department and received for answer that they would place at my command all the prisoners of the South if the proposition was accepted. I heard nothing more on the subject.

The following private letter from General Lee to a friend and relative was not intended for the public eye, but it may be accepted as his full conviction on this subject:

LEXINGTON, VA., April 17, 1867.

DR. CHARLES CARTER,
No. 1632 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR DR. CARTER: I have received your letter of the 9th instant, inclosing one to you from Mr. J. Francis Fisher in relation to certain information which he had received from Bishop Wilmer. My respect for Mr. Fisher's wishes would induce me to reply fully to all his questions, but I have not time to do so satisfactorily; and, for reasons which I am sure you both will appreciate, I have a great repugnance to being brought before the public in any manner.

Sufficient information has been officially published, I think, to show that whatever sufferings the Federal prisoners at the South underwent were incident to their position as prisoners and produced by the destitute condition of the country arising from the operations of war. The laws of the Confederate congress and the orders of the war department directed that the rations furnished prisoners of war should be the same in quantity and quality as those furnished enlisted men in the army of the Confederacy, and that the hospitals for prisoners should be placed on the same footing as other Confederate States hospitals in all respects.

It was the desire of the Confederate authorities to effect acontinuous and speedy exchange of prisoners of war, for it was their true policy to do so, as their retention was not only a calamity to them, but a heavy expenditure of their scanty means of subsistence and a privation of the services of a veteran army. Mr. Fisher or Bishop Wilmer has confounded my offers for the exchange of prisoners with those made by Mr. Ould, the commissioner of the Confederate States. It was he that offered, when all hopes of effecting the exchange had ceased, to deliver all the Federal sick and wounded to the amount of 15,000 without an equivalent, provided transportation was furnished.

Previous to this, I think, I offered to General Grant to send into his lines all the prisoners within my department, which then embraced Virginia and North Carolina, provided he would return me man for man; and when I informed the Confederate authorities of my proposition I was told that if it was accepted they would place all the prisoners at the South at my disposal. I offered subsequently, I think, to the committee of the United States Sanitary Commission, who visited Petersburg for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of their prisoners, to do the same, but my proposition was not accepted. Dr. Joseph Jones has recently published a pamphlet termed Researches Upon Spurious Vaccination, etc., issued from the University Medical Press, Nashville, Tenn., in which he treats of certain diseases of the Federal prisoners at Andersonville and their causes, which I think would be interesting to you as a medical man, and would furnish Mr. Fisher with some of the information he desires.

And now I wish you to understand that what I have written is for your personal information and not for publication, and to send as an expression of thanks to Mr. Fisher for his kind efforts to relieve the sufferings of the Southern people.

I am very much obliged to you for the prayers you offered for us in the days of trouble. Those days are still prolonged, and we earnestly look for aid to our merciful God. Should I have any use for the file of papers you kindly offer me, I will let you know.

All my family unite with me in kind regards to your wife and children.

And I am, very truly, your cousin,

R. E. LEE.

This testimony of General Lee shows that the statements made with reference to the treatment of Federal prisoners in Confederate prisons are not borne out by the facts as they existed and were proven.

Against the baseless statements of those who make the charges of cruelty and outrage committed upon the Federal prisoners in Confederate prisons I place the stainless word of this stainless Confederate officer. I desire to call attention to the evidence of another Confederate official.

I present the testimony of a Georgian, the vice-president of the Confederate States. His word has never been questioned. His long public service in the Congress of the United States, both prior and subsequent to the civil war, and his high character, will give to his statements the sanction of absolute verity.

Vice-President A. H. Stephens, in his War Between the States, volume 2, pages 507–510, says in reference to the Federal prisoners sent South:

Large numbers of them were taken to southwestern Georgia in 1864, because it was a section most remote and secure from the invading Federal armies, and because, too, it was a country of all others then within the Confederate limits not thus threatened with an invasion, most abundant with food, and all resources at command for the health and comfort of prisoners. They were put in one stockade for the want of men to guard more than one.

The section of country, moreover, was not regarded as more unhealthy or more subject to malarious influences than any in the central part of the State. The official order for the erection of the stockade enjoined that it should be in "a healthy locality, plenty of pure water, a running stream, and, if possible, shade trees, and in the immediate neighborhood of grist and saw mills." The very selection of the locality, so far from being, as you suppose, made with cruel designs against the prisoners, was governed by the most humane considerations. * * *

As far as mortuary returns afford evidence of the general treatment of prisoners on both sides, the figures show nothing to the disadvantage of the Confederates, notwithstanding their limited supplies of all kinds and notwithstanding all that has been said of the horrible sacrifice of life at Andersonville.

It now appears that a larger number of Confederates died in Northern than of Federals in Southern prisons or stockades. The report of Mr. Stanton, as Secretary of War, on the 19th of July, 1866, exhibits the fact that of the Federal prisoners in Confederate hands during the war only 22,576 died, while of the Confederate prisoners in Federal hands 26,436 died. This report does not set forth the exact number of prisoners held by each side respectively.

These facts were given more in detail in a subsequent report by Surgeon-General Barnes, of the United States Army. His report I have not seen, but according to a statement editorially in the National Intelligencer—a very high authority—it appears from the Surgeon-General's report that the whole number of Federal prisoners captured by the Confederates and held in Southern prisons, from first to last during the war, was, in round numbers, 270,000, while the whole number of Confederates captured and held in prisons by the Federals was, in like round numbers, only 220,000. From these two reports it appears that, with 50,000 more prisoners in Southern stockades or other modes of confinement, the deaths were nearly 4,000 less. According to these figures the per cent of Federal deaths in Southern prisons was under 9, while the per cent of Confederate deaths in Northern prisons was over 12. These mortality statistics are of no small weight in determining on which side was the most neglect, cruelty, and inhumanity.

In the summer of 1864 Mr. Robert Ould, the Confederate commissioner for the exchange of prisoners, in consequence of information communicated to him by the surgeon-general of the Confederate States as to the deficiency of medicines, offered to make purchases of medicines from the United States authorities, to be used exclusively for the relief of Union prisoners. He offered to pay gold, cotton, or tobacco for them, and even two or three prices if required. At the same time assurances were given that the medicines should be used exclusively for the treatment of Union prisoners, and he moreover agreed on behalf of the Confederate Government, if it were insisted on, that such medicines might be brought into the Confederate lines by United States surgeons and dispensed by them. To this offer no reply was ever received.

Finally a delegation from the prisoners at Andersonville was sent to Washington for the purpose of pleading their cause for the exchange, but the authorities at Washington refused to see them, and they returned.

An examination of the records of both Governments, of the United States and the Confederate States, and the evidence given before Congressional committees and furnished elsewhere will demonstrate that—

The laws of the Confederate congress, the orders of the war department, the regulations of the surgeon-general, the action of our generals in the field, and the orders of those who had the immediate charge of prisoners, all provided that prisoners in the hands of Confederates should be kindly treated, supplied with the same rations which our soldiers had, and cared for when sick in hospitals placed on precisely the same footing as the hospitals for Confederate soldiers.

If these regulations were violated in individual instances, and if subordinates were sometimes cruel to prisoners, it was without the knowledge or consent of the Confederate Government, which always took prompt action on any case reported to them.

The mortality in Southern prisons (fearfully large, although over 3 per cent less than the mortality in Northern prisons) resulted from causes beyond the control of our authorities, from epidemics, etc., which might have been avoided or greatly mitigated had not the Federal Government declared medicines "contraband of war;" refused the proposition of Judge Ould that each Government should send its own surgeons with medicines, hospital stores, etc., to minister to soldiers in prison; declined his proposition to send medicines to its own men in Southern prisons without being required to allow the Confederates the same privilege; refused to allow the Confederate Government to buy medicines for gold, tobacco, or cotton, which it offered to pledge its honor should be used only for Federal prisoners in its hands; refused to exchange sick and wounded, and neglected from August to December, 1864, to accede to Judge Ould's proposition to send transportation to Savannah, and received without equivalent from ten to fifteen thousand Federal prisoners, notwithstanding the fact that this offer was accompanied with a statement of the utter inability of the Confederacy to provide for these prisoners and a detailed report of the monthly mortality at Andersonville, and that Judge Ould again and again urged compliance with his humane proposal. (See Southern Historical Papers—Treatment of Prisoners, by J. William Jones.)

I desire now to refer to some official documents to support my statement made to-day in colloquy with my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

The causes which induced the Confederate Congress to pass the resolution referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] were the orders issued by command of Major-General Pope, on July 18, 1862, and on July 23, 1862, known as General Orders, No. 5, No. 6, No. 7, and No. 11.

The following is a copy of No. 7:

[General Orders, No. 7.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Washington, July 18, 1862.

The people of the valley of the Shenandoah and throughout the regions of operations of this Army, living along the lines of railroad and telegraph, and along routes of travel in the rear of United States forces, are notified that they will be held responsible for any injury done the track, line, or road, or for any attacks upon the trains or straggling soldiers by bands of guerrillas in their neighborhood. * * * Evil-disposed persons in the rear of our Armies who do not themselves engage directly in these lawless acts, encourage by refusing to interfere or give any information by which such acts can be prevented or the perpetrators punished.

Safety of the life and property of all persons living in the rear of our advancing Army depends upon the maintenance of peace and quiet among themselves and upon the unmolested movements through their midst of all pertaining to the military service. They are to understand distinctly that the security of travel is their only warrant of personal safety. * * * If a soldier or legitimate follower of the Army be fired upon from any house, the house shall be razed to the ground and the inhabitants sent prisoners to the headquarters of this Army. If such an outrage occur at any place distant from settlements, the people within 5 miles around shall be held accountable and made to pay an indemnity sufficient for the case; and any person detected in such outrages, either during the act or at any time afterwards, shall be shot without waiting civil process. * * *

By command of Major-General Pope:

GEORGE D. RUGGLES, Colonel.

The following is a copy of Order No. 11:

[General Orders, No. 11.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Washington, July 23, 1862.

Commanders of army corps, divisions, brigades, and detached commands will proceed immediately to arrest all disloyal male citizens within their lines, or within their reach in the rear of their respective stations.

Such as are willing to take the oath of allegiance to the United States and will furnish sufficient security for its observance shall be permitted to remain at their homes and pursue in good faith their accustomed avocations. Those who refuse shall be conducted south beyond the extreme pickets of the Army and be notified that if found again anywhere within our lines, or at any point in the rear, they will be considered spies and subjected to the extreme rigor of the military law. * * *

By command of Major-General Pope:

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel, Assistant Adjutant-General, and Chief of Staff.

In a letter dated July 30, 1862, addressed to General Lee, commanding the Confederate army in Virginia, President Davis inclosed the act of Congress referred to, and said, among other things:

For the present we renounce our right of retaliation on the innocent, and shall continue to treat the private enlisted soldiers of General Pope's army as prisoners of war; but if, after notice to the Government at Washington of our confining repressive measures to the punishment only of commissioned officers who are willing participants in these crimes, these savage practices are continued, we shall reluctantly be forced to the last resort of accepting the war on the terms chosen by our foes, until the outraged voice of a common humanity forces a respect for the recognized rules of war.

And he concludes as follows:

You are therefore instructed to communicate to the Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States the contents of this letter and a copy of the inclosed general order, to the end that he may be notified of our intention not to consider any officers hereafter captured from General Pope's army as prisoners of war.

And thus was effected the results designed by the act of the Confederate Congress, that the rules of recognized civil warfare should be followed, and no retaliatory measures were resorted to by the Confederate Government or its officers.

In marked contrast with the orders of General Pope quoted, I call attention to the following: On July 7, 1862, Gen. George B. McClellan, in a letter to President Lincoln, written from camp near Harrisons Landing, Virginia, said:

This rebellion has assumed the character of a war. As such it should be regarded, and it should be conducted upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization. * * *

In prosecuting the war all private property and unarmed persons should be strictly protected, subject only to the necessity of military operations; all private property taken for military use should be paid or receipted for; pillage and waste should be treated as high crimes, all unnecessary trespass sternly prohibited, and offensive demeanor by the military toward citizens promptly rebuked. Military arrests should not be tolerated except in places where active hostilities exist, and oaths not required by enactments constitutionally should be neither demanded nor received.

I have endeavored to present on this question of the treatment of prisoners in Southern prisons and the failure to exchange them the evidence taken from the public documents and records of both the United States and Confederate Governments, with no other purpose in view except that the truth of history on this subject may be established and that the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] shall not go unchallenged, believing that these facts fully refute it.

But whatever acts may have been committed during the civil war by the armies or officials of either the United States or the Confederate government which are alleged to have been cruelties, they should not be pleaded as justification for the cruelties perpetrated in the Philippines. All I desire to say upon this subject is that those who justify such acts of cruelty under the law of retaliation can not find support for such acts or justification in General Orders, No. 100, containing instructions for the armies of the United States Government in the field, issued on April 24, 1863.

On the contrary, that order and the instructions contained in that order expressly forbid such acts of cruelty as are alleged to have been committed in the Philippines. This order has been asserted by some as full authority and justification for the cruelties alleged to have been perpetrated upon the Filipinos. I most earnestly deny that any justification for such cruelties can be found in that order.

Section 1, article 16, declares:

Military necessity does not admit of cruelty—that is, the infliction of suffering for the sake of suffering, or for revenge, nor of maiming or wounding, except in fight, nor of torture to extort confessions.

Section 1, article 28, declares that—

Retaliation will therefore never be resorted to as a measure of mere revenge, but only as a means of protective retribution, and, moreover, cautiously and unavoidably. * * * Unjust or inconsiderate retaliation removes the belligerents further and further from the mitigating rules of regular war, and by rapid steps leads them nearer to the internecine wars of savages.

Article 56 of section 3 declares:

A prisoner of war is subject to no punishment for being a public enemy, nor is any revenge wreaked upon him by the intentional infliction of any suffering or disgrace by cruel imprisonment, want of food, by mutilation, death, or any other barbarity.

Whatever cruel or inhuman means may have been used to extort confessions from prisoners by the officers or men of the United States Army in the Philippines, whether by means of the water cure or whatever other means may have been resorted to, they can find no justification under this order, No. 100, referred to. On the contrary, such conduct is prohibited by that order.

We find in section 3, article 80, of that order the following:

Honorable men, when captured, will abstain from giving to the enemy information concerning their own army, and the modern law of war permits no longer the use of any violence against prisoners in order to extort the desired information or to punish them for having given false information.

In the name of the officers and men of both armies, in defense of the living and dead heroes on both sides of that great struggle, I repudiate the assertion that any of the cruelties alleged to have been committed on the Filipinos can find sanction or justification in any of the orders or conduct of either the Federal or Confederate officials.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to make political capital out of any unfortunate, miserable cruelties that may have been perpetrated in the Philippines. I sorrow at them when they are related. I am proud of the chivalry of the American Army.

I have no desire to hold up to public gaze any wrong that may have been done. But I desire to say this much: As I abhor any wrong that may have been done in the Philippines, so I charge it home upon the policy of an Administration that makes it necessary for the boys of this country—raised in Christian homes, educated by Christian parents, who out of love for their country or patriotism and devotion to its flag have followed it across the ocean to the distant isles of the sea—to obey the Commander in Chief of the Army and the generals and officers who command them, to engage in such a war of aggression and spoliation, a war for empire and not for defense. Such is the policy which has been always followed, and such has been the result in the history of the world in the effort of a superior race to destroy the liberties and govern by force of arms an inferior and alien race. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ZENOR].

Mr. ZENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to-night for the purpose of making any extended remarks. It is perfectly obvious that the time limit would preclude the possibility of any such thought. But, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the members of this House will soon be called upon to cast their votes and express their deliberate judgment upon the merits of the two propositions with which this House is confronted, I take this opportunity of entering my earnest protest against the passage of the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

For days and weeks, yea, months, Mr. Chairman, the able and distinguished Committee on Insular Affairs were engaged in an earnest effort to formulate a wise and statesmanlike measure for the patriotic purpose of solving the difficult, intricate, and complicated questions involved in our Philippine policy. The result of the deliberations of this committee was a report to the House of two bills, one by the majority and the other by the minority of that committee.

The bills presented by the majority and minority of this committee accentuate the difference of views between the members of that committee, and in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, substantially express the difference of views upon the important questions involved of the two great political parties of this country.

I shall not attempt, as I said before, to engage in the discussion of any particular question involved in this controversy to-night. It seems to me that there has been more or less of partisanship displayed in the discussion of this great question, and perhaps more than should have characterized the consideration of questions involving so much to our Government.

The highest and best thought of the greatest minds and intellects of the nation should be invoked in a proper solution of these questions, to enable us to arrive at a proper conclusion in reference to these different views. There has been more or less said in criticism of some parts of the army in the Philippines, and with a good deal of the accusations that have been made as against the soldiers I have but little sympathy.

I mean to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not share, if such a feeling or sentiment is shared in this country, in the opinion that there is any such conduct disclosed in the Philippine Islands to justify a general charge, or a general arraignment, or a general criticism of the Army of the United States. That there are exceptional cases of cruelty, of misconduct, of violations, perhaps, of the rules of civilized warfare in the Philippine Islands would not be disputed by any gentleman on the other side of this Chamber.

I do not sympathize with the idea, Mr. Chairman, that these soldiers in many instances should be held responsible in the eyes of the law for what they have done. I believe that the only defense that can be made of the cruelty and inhumanity which have been charged in the Philippine Islands can only be made upon the theory which was adopted by Lord Erskine when called upon to make defense of Warren Hastings for similar cruelties and similar inhumanities practiced in India. After Great Britain had conquered India she sent as her representative, as governor-general or viceroy, Warren Hastings to govern that conquered country, that subjugated people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ZENOR. When Warren Hastings was charged with these cruelties before the House of Lords in England, Edmund Burke arraigned him for his cruelties and for his misconduct and for what seemed to be a violation of all rules of civilized warfare.

After that terrible arraignment before the House of Lords, Lord Erskine, that astute, skilled, splendid lawyer, and great statesman as the counsel of Warren Hastings confessed all of the charges that had been made against him, as was true in the defense of Gen. Jacob H. Smith in the Philippine Islands, but he called the attention of the House of Lords to the fact that Warren Hastings could not be held guilty for the execution of the policy of the Government of Great Britain.

He argued that he was in India representing the British Government, representing the British policy, and that the only defense that could be made in his case was that it was not Warren Hastings but the policy of Great Britain which put him there; that his client, Mr. Hastings, was not the real culprit, not the responsible criminal; that if there existed criminal responsibility for any of the acts charged against, and for which Warren Hastings had been so fiercely arraigned by the distinguished Burke, they should be charged against the English Government, against the Parliament of Great Britain who had inaugurated the policy, the inevitable consequences of which were the very cruelties and horrors of which complaint was made and in the execution of which his client was but a mere instrument in the hands of his superiors, the officials of the British Government, and it is recorded that it was upon this plea and upon this theory that Warren Hastings went acquit.

So it is, Mr. Chairman, in all of this misconduct in the Philippine Islands. I believe, as I stand here to-night, that it is by reason of the policy that has been inaugurated in those islands that these things have happened. It is one of the inevitable consequences, it is one of the results of carrying on a war to subjugate a foreign people, aliens to ourselves in habits, in thought, in every characteristic that can divide two races.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have digressed from the purpose for which I rose. I desired, Mr. Chairman, simply to make a contribution to this discussion and to dedicate here to-night a poem which was written by a very able divine at my home town, the Rev. H. I. Stern, of Corydon, Ind., which I regard as not only highly worthy but apropos to the subject under discussion, and I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

MATER DOLOROSA.

Madonna of the nations, Columbia, mother-maid,
Who, terrible in loving, once madest kings afraid.
Where is thy brave aloofness and heritage of pride?
A sword thy soul hath entered, thy Christ is crucified.

Is this the morning's promise, an arid afternoon,
That thou art sick and wearied of mercy's task so soon,
That morning when the toilers and all the earth's oppressed
Beheld thee 'mid the oceans and rose and called thee blest?

Still they await in battle thy voice across the sea,
But thou dost sit and mutter thy gospel doubtingly,
While princes are thy wooers, and traffickers in blood,
And priests of hoary falsehoods, and all the pagan brood.

They lift their heads exulting and laugh their cynic laugh,
The people's dream of freedom is blown away like chaff;
For she is grown as we are, proud, rich, her faith is cold,
All things will be to-morrow as they have been of old.

From distant sunrise islands reach hands to thee in vain,
The hands of driven slayers, the spirits of the slain;
Well dost thou droop and cover thy sullied head in shame,
For they who kill are killing, Columbia, in thy name!

And thou must teach thy children to prate the cant of knaves,
That they for this are freemen, to make their brothers slaves;
Then is thy charter forfeit, thou handmaid of the Lord,
They who the sword have taken have perished by the sword.

O, prophetess of freedom, O, priestess of the right,
Stops then at the Pacific God's highway for the light?
Esteemed thou so lightly His glory on thy brow?
Is He among the nations to have no witness now?

Nay, yet arise, beloved, and cleanse thy skirts of blood,
Return unto thy calling and to thy holier mood;
Once more lift on the peoples thy chastened eyes like stars,
Lest God be wroth and spurn thee, Columbia of the wars.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CONNER having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. QUAY, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. QUAY. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. QUAY. I do not care to have the vote taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a good time to do that.

Mr. QUAY. Evidently there is not a quorum present. So I will withdraw the motion for the present.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 23d instant, a list of all judgments rendered in favor of claimants in Indian depredation cases not heretofore appropriated for; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I report back from the Committee on the District of Columbia the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 493) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia." I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PRITCHARD, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. MARTIN were appointed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURTON introduced a bill (S. 6271) for the appointment of an additional United States commissioner and constable in the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6272) granting an increase of pension to George O. Wright;

A bill (S. 6273) granting an increase of pension to Orrin D. Nichols (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6274) granting an increase of pension to Jacob D. Crabb; and

A bill (S. 6275) granting an increase of pension to Lewis D. Frogge (with accompanying papers).

Mr. DRYDEN introduced a bill (S. 6276) granting a pension to Mary E. Russell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 6277) for the relief of the Bardstown and Louisville Turnpike Company and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CLAPP introduced a bill (S. 6278) to extend the provisions of chapter 8, Title XXXII, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Reservation and sale of town sites on the public lands" to the ceded Indian lands in the State of Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 6279) granting a pension to Elisa Palmer Potter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARMACK introduced a bill (S. 6280) for the relief of the estate of Josiah P. Ashford, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 6281) to provide for the leasing of water power created by public works; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington (for Mr. MCMILLAN) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 119) to provide for opening to the public free of charge the Lincoln Museum in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT of New York introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 120) providing for the removal of shoal in North River of New York Harbor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 121) giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Thirty-sixth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of October, 1902, and for other purposes incident to said encampment; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PROCTOR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 122) to fix the lineal and relative rank of officers of the Army in the artillery arm promoted or appointed to vacancies created or caused by the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CUMBERLAND RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 6270) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1902; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BATE. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, and beg to state the reason for action upon it.

There was an error in the river and harbor act affecting the Cumberland River. It has been corrected, in part, at least—that is, a bill was introduced in the other House by Mr. BURTON. I now introduce it here, and ask for action upon it immediately. The river and harbor act has become a law. This was simply an error in the engrossment, and the fact is known by the Senator who had the bill in charge. It will take but a moment.

Mr. BERRY. By permission of the Senate, I will state that the river and harbor act as it passed both Houses was exactly as the conferees reported it. A mistake was made in the Secretary's office.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In the Clerk's office?

Mr. BERRY. No; in the office of the Secretary of the Senate. I wish to say on behalf of the Secretary, however, that it is the first mistake which has occurred in his office for fifteen years, and there is no blame attached to him. At any rate, the amendment which applied to the Upper Cumberland was in the enrollment of the bill made to apply to the Cumberland below Nashville. It has been submitted to Mr. BURTON in the House, and I have had a talk with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], who was in charge of the conferees about it. This is simply to make the bill precisely as it passed both Houses and to correct the error. I hope unanimous consent will be given for its consideration.

Mr. BATE. That is all I ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the two paragraphs thereof providing for the improvement of the Cumberland River, Tennessee, below Nashville, and of the Cumberland River, Tennessee, above Nashville, shall read as follows:

"Improving Cumberland River, Tennessee, below Nashville: For the completion of the lock and dam at Harpeth Shoals and for maintenance, $180,000.

"Improving Cumberland River, Tennessee, above Nashville: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, $200,000, of which so much as may be necessary shall be used for the completion of Lock and Dam No. 1. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to grant leases or licenses to the highest responsible bidder for the use of the water power created by said dam, at such a rate and on such conditions and for such periods of time as may seem to him expedient; and he is also authorized, in his discretion, to issue permits for the construction, maintenance, and operation of inlet and outlet canals and other structures, on such plans as he may approve, for the diversion of the water aforesaid: Provided, That any lease or license so granted shall be limited to the use of the surplus water not required for navigation, and no structures shall be built and no operations be conducted which shall in any manner injure navigation, interfere with the operations of the Government, or impair the usefulness of any improvement made by the Government for the benefit of navigation; and the right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal the provisions of this paragraph is hereby expressly reserved: Provided further, That before leasing or licensing such water privileges, or issuing permits for the construction and operation of such canals, or otherwise disposing of any water power or privilege, the Secretary of War shall first advertise the same in one or more daily papers at Nashville for sixty days immediately preceding, stating specifically the right or privilege proposed to be leased or conveyed, with its exact limitations, inviting bids for the same, and he may, in his discretion, then lease the same for a specific term of years at so much per year, to be paid semiannually in cash into the Treasury, and the Secretary of War shall reserve the right to reject any or all bids."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO THE DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,654.10 to pay the North American Transportation and Trading Company for supplies furnished in 1899 to the tribe of Koyukuk Indians in the district of Alaska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALDRICH submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $700 to pay Henry A. Nelson the difference between his salary as folder and that of mail messenger from July 1, 1900, to May 1, 1902, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to reopen the claim of the State of Rhode Island for expenses incurred by that State in aiding the United States to raise and equip volunteers entering the service of the United States to assist in the war with Spain, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $600 to pay Guy N. Stockslager for his labor and services under employment of Lieut. D. H. Jarvis, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, in an urgent emergency during the epidemic in Alaska in 1900, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,704.46 to pay Chamberlain, Delany & Scott, of Richmond, Va., the amount provided for by the act approved June 3, 1902, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to revive and continue in force section 2 of the deficiency appropriation act of May 18, 1872, relative to all labor performed in excess of eight hours per day by all laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by the Government since May 19, 1869, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,702.96 to pay certain enlisted men of the Marine Corps who were detailed on duty at the headquarters of the corps, Washington, D. C., and in the office of the assistant quartermaster, Marine Corps, Philadelphia, Pa., from April 26, 1898, to May 25, 1900, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,865.31 to pay the legal representative of the estate of James W. Schaumburg, deceased, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MONEY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $754.09 to pay Thomas G. Ingram the difference between his salary as a machinist and that of a conductor of an elevator, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLACKBURN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 to pay John L. Smithmeyer and Paul J. Pelz for expenses estimated to have been incurred by them in the preparations of the plans and drawings for the Library of Congress, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. DEBOE. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table. I give notice that on Thursday morning, after the routine morning business, I shall call up the amendment and ask the consent of the Senate to submit some remarks thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Kentucky will lie on the table and be printed.

PARK COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 copies of Senate Report No. 166, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, be printed and bound in cloth for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This comes within the limit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The printing will not cost more than $500?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will cost less than $500.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask to be relieved from further service upon the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks to be relieved from further service upon the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Is there objection to granting the request? The Chair hears none.

EXISTING TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer a resolution which I ask to have read, printed, and to lie over, and I give notice that I shall endeavor to find an opportunity to-morrow to speak briefly to the resolution.

The resolution was read, and ordered to be printed and to lie over, as follows:

Resolved, That the present phenomenal prosperity in all lines of business and industry in the United States is largely due to the existing tariff law, and the best interests of the country demand its continuance.

EMPLOYMENT OF MESSENGER.

Mr. BURTON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

POSTAL CLAIMS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. QUARLES (by request) submitted the following resolution; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Postmaster-General be, and hereby is, directed to report to the Senate the amount of salary required to be paid to each of the postmasters in the State of Wisconsin named on the memorandum schedule hereto attached, or to their heirs, for services as postmasters in each biennial term specified on such memorandum schedule in order to make effective sections 473, 474, and 475 of the postal regulations of 1866 and the act of June 12, 1866, section 8, and the act of March 3, 1883, as construed by Postmaster-General Gresham in an order dated June 9, 1883, addressed to Hon. Frank Hatton, First Assistant Postmaster-General, in a declaration as to the intent, meaning, and requirement of said statutes, furnished for publication to the press through Chief Clerk Walker on February 16, 1884, and printed as Exhibit A, Senate Executive Document No. 146, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

JAMES R. MULLIKIN.

On motion of Mr. DRYDEN, it was Ordered, That leave be granted James R. Mullikin to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in his case, copies of the same having been left in the files, as provided by clause 2 of Rule XXX.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

On motion of Mr. McCOMAS, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate 1,000 copies of the bill H. R. 3076, an act limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or any Territory, or the District of Columbia, thereby securing better products, and for other purpose.

FORT STEVENS NATIONAL MILITARY PARK.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following resolution; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 500 copies of the letter, June 2, 1902, from the Fort Stevens Lincoln National Military Park Association, with the appendices A, B, C, and D, all in explanation of the object of the association as contemplated by Senate bill No. 4476, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, to establish a national military park at the battlefield of Fort Stevens, in the District of Columbia, be printed for the use of the Senate.

CLAIMS AGAINST COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to make a request.

On yesterday the President sent a message to the Senate in relation to certain claims against the Government of Colombia, with accompanying papers. The Chair supposed that an order to print covered both message and accompanying papers, but a doubt has been raised, and, if there be no objection, the order will be made that the accompanying papers, as well as the message, shall be printed. The Chair hears no objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 11019) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to bestow medals upon First Lieut. David H. Jarvis, Second Lieut. Ellsworth P. Bertholf, and Samuel J. Call, surgeon, all of the Revenue-Cutter Service; and

A bill (H. R. 11987) relating to transportation of dutiable merchandise at subports of Tacoma and Seattle, State of Washington.

The bill (H. R. 97) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish duplicate certificates of discharge was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 1456) granting a pension to William G. Miller.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a unanimous-consent agreement that immediately after the routine business this morning the Appalachian Forest Reserve bill shall be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CLAY. I was not aware of that fact. I will withdraw the request. I do not desire to violate any unanimous-consent agreement.

BEILINBERG AGAINST SCOTT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BAILEY, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate all of the papers in the case of Beilinberg against Scott, including all communications sent to and received from the ambassador of the United States to Mexico in respect to the same.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a resolution I desire to have considered and adopted, but it is not a matter that I desire to have interfere with measures of public importance now pending. If any of the conferences on appropriation bills are ready, or if the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] is ready to proceed with his motion, with any hope of disposing of it, I would be glad to yield, with the understanding that the resolution will go over.

At the proper time I will make a statement to the Senate in explanation of the resolution, and my statement will involve some criticism of the American ambassador to Mexico and some criticism of the State Department. But I think that this matter can better wait than some of the measures which other Senators are anxious to dispose of.

Mr. BURTON. If the morning business is disposed of, I desire to call up Senate bill 5228.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a unanimous-consent agreement that when the morning business is disposed of the Appalachian forest reserve bill shall be taken up. What does the Senator from Texas desire to have done with this resolution? Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read to the Senate.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me to make a motion to take up the motion to discharge the Committee on Territories from the consideration of the statehood bill?

Mr. BAILEY. I will very gladly do that, provided my resolution is not displaced. I am anxious to have it adopted, and if it can be understood that it does not lose its place and I can call it up to-morrow or the next day, I will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks that the resolution may lie on the table, retaining its place. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. The resolution came over from yesterday?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution came over from yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it a resolution that will lead to some debate?

Mr. BAILEY. I shall desire to make a statement of ten or fifteen minutes. It being largely a statement of fact, I imagine that it can lead to no protracted debate. But I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa frankly that in what I will say I shall take occasion to criticise the American ambassador to Mexico, and to criticise some officials of the State Department in connection with this case of Beilinberg against Scott.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. If it can go over with that understanding, I shall be glad to get it out of the way of these other matters.

Mr. QUAY. Then, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 5228.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5228) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve."

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me to make the motion?

Mr. BURTON. I desire to say that I think the Senate is ready to vote on this bill. I do not want to make any remarks at all, and if the Senate is ready to vote I should like to have the vote taken.

Mr. QUAY. I will renew the motion, then, in the near future, with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not within the power of the Senator from Kansas to accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. We are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement and no such suggestion or request is in order.

NATIONAL APPALACHIAN FOREST RESERVE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5228) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve," which had been reported from the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game with amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. QUARLES. I call for the reading of the report of the committee upon this measure. I think the Senate ought to know the views of the committee.

Mr. BATE. Before that is done, I ask leave to submit an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BURTON. There are some two or three short committee amendments. I hope the Senator will let them first be acted on.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there a report on the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report is demanded by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES]. There are amendments pending from the committee. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Tennessee, however, if he desires to have his amendment printed.

Mr. BATE. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator delay that for a few minutes?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. BURTON April 18, 1902, as follows:

The Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5228) for the purchase of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountains, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve," beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that the accompanying bill (S. 5228) do pass as amended and be substituted for Senate bill 5518:

This is a bill enacting that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be authorized and empowered to purchase land in the Southern Appalachian Mountains for a national forest reserve, to be known as the "National Appalachian Forest Reserve."

A similar bill, or a bill having the same object in view (S. 5518), was favorably reported to the Senate on the 12th of February, 1901 (Senate Report No. 2221, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session), and the subject is exhaustively treated in Senate Document No. 84, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.

As these reports treat of the matter so thoroughly, it is believed that anything further from this committee than the following brief statement would be merely cumulative and therefore superfluous:

The purpose of this bill is to set aside in the Southern Appalachian Mountains region a national reserve for the preservation of the forests of that district, the perpetuation of the timber supply, the development of its farming resources, and the regulation of the water flow in its streams. It authorizes the purchase for the people by the Secretary of Agriculture, under certain reasonable restrictions, of not more than 4,000,000 acres of land to be selected in the mountain forest region of Virginia, West Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee. It also authorizes the Secretary to accept and administer donations of land in the same vicinity for the same purposes.

An orderly consideration of the objects of the bill involves a knowledge of the land proposed to be reserved, of its resources, its present condition, its needs, its relation to the surrounding country, the benefits to be derived from its reservation, and the general demand for the public action therein proposed.

The land to be reserved is located between the Blue Ridge and the Unaka Mountains. It extends from the southern part of Virginia and West Virginia to the northern part of Alabama and Georgia; it comprises the greatest mountain masses east of the Rockies; the finest scenery, the richest forests, the mightiest rivers, and the greatest variety of geologic formations from the Archæan to the late Cambrian.

The oldest, largest, and most varied primeval hard-wood forests of the continent are within its limits. One hundred and thirty-seven species of trees have been examined and described by the Government experts who have visited and surveyed the territory. The list of shrubs and smaller plants is still greater. Northern varieties mingle with Southern; those from the Gulf region with those from New England. It contains a unique natural collection of forest species selected and fostered by soil and climate which, if once destroyed, can never be replaced. Among these are cherry, walnut, yellow poplar, chestnut, ash, beech, and oak, and the magnolia and mulberry. The more valuable species have already been thinned and culled wastefully and injudiciously by the pioneer lumberman, whose effort is naturally to reap as large and immediate profit as possible without regard to a future timber supply or to the effect of their cutting on mountain farms and water power. Lumbering operations in this region were never more destructive than at present, and this destruction is often augmented by forest fires.

Following or accompanying the lumberman is the farmer, who attempts to sustain his family in clearings on the steep mountain slopes. Already about 24 per cent of the area under consideration has been cleared and cultivated, and sometimes these clearings extend to the very summits of the mountains, where they are subjected to the most destructive erosion. The productive life of one of these mountain clearings is very limited, seldom lasting more than from three to five years at most. Bleaching tree trunks, remants of magnificent forests, still stand in the midst of cornfields plowed for the last time.

The land once deprived of its forest cover is leeched, wasted, and impoverished by the excessive rains, and soon ceases to yield even the small amount of produce for the support of the farmer and his family, and is hence abandoned, to be washed away.

But the district is valuable not alone to lumberman, farmer, and scientist. The scenery about the falls, cascades, and gorges is beautiful beyond description. The view from the greater elevations of the Blue Ridge and Great Smoky mountains can rarely be equaled. The climate of the region is, in the main, a middle-latitude climate, modified by elevation and by Gulf winds. The temperature varies between moderate extremes. In the course of a day's excursion from the foot to the summit of Mount Mitchell one may pass in retrogression through all the seasons, from late summer to early spring. In accessibility and natural charm it is full of attraction for the health and pleasure seeker.

The region is likewise the great eastern watershed where the principal rivers have their sources and from which they flow radially through the great valleys of Tennessee and of Virginia: The James, the Roanoke, the Yadkin, the Catawba, the Broad, the Savannah flow to the Atlantic, transport the commerce of the country, water its farms, and furnish power for the growing industries of the South; the Alabama and the Chattahoochee flow to the Gulf; the Hiwassee, Tuckaseegee, Nolichucky, Watauga, Holston, French Broad, Little Tennessee, and Kanawha (or New) to the Ohio and the Mississippi.

The rainfall in the region is excessive, ranging from 60 inches for the year in Georgia to 71 to 100 inches in North Carolina; and is exceeded nowhere in the United States except on the North Pacific coast. This fact has an important bearing upon the proposition to reserve and protect the forest of this region. It makes it especially necessary that the ground cover, the humus, leaves, network of tree roots—in fact, all that makes the soil porous or spongy—should in every way be preserved. In the absence of ponds, lakes, and marshes this is the natural reservoir for the storage and regulation of the water supply. During the year last past floods in the rivers of the Piedmont Plateau and the valleys of East Tennessee and Virginia swept away buildings, farms, bridges, and roads exceeding in value the sum of $18,000,000. A large part of this loss might have been prevented if the forests about the river sources had been preserved and protected.

Not the smallest of the resources of this Southern Appalachian country is its water power. At various points on its numerous and important streams, between their sources and the head of navigation, are falls and rapids which furnish valuable power for the increasing manufactures of that region. Estimates made by the Geological Survey during the last three years place the available power at 1,000,000 horsepower, which at the least calculation would mean a saving in the coal consumption of the region equivalent to $30,000,000 annually. The utility of this power depends upon the uniformity of the water flow, and the water flow is very largely regulated by the forest cover.

Farming settlements within the limits of the proposed reserve are neither numerous nor populous. Under proper supervision they may be allowed to continue without detriment to the proposed reserve. In fact, they will undoubtedly be benefited by the measures to be adopted. Mining claims and manufacturing industries will likewise be protected and stimulated within the reserve area.

The needs of the region may therefore be summed up in the words "forest protection." This means the preservation of the trees, the perpetuation and utilization of the timber supply, the salvation of the mountain and valley farms, the prevention of fires and floods, and the regulation of the water flow which furnishes the power.

These needs have long been recognized by observant men, but the ability to satisfy them resides not with individuals or States. The streams to be protected often rise in one State, flow through a second, and empty into the sea within the boundaries of a third. No individual or State can be expected to expend money in protecting the sources of a stream or developing its power when the benefits are to be enjoyed by the public generally in another State or neighborhood.

The National Government alone can afford to undertake works of this magnitude, and it is the only power able economically and consistently to administer and exploit the same. The benefits are national, the demand is national, and the legislation should be equally broad in its scope and application. The necessity for the proposed action is national.

Within the last three years memorials, resolutions, and petitions have been received from scientific societies, State legislatures, numberless newspapers, boards of trade, and trade journals, heartily advocating the passage of the measure proposed, and President McKinley and President Roosevelt have both advocated it.
